"That the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland shall, on the first day of January, 1801, and ever after, be united into one kingdom, by the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; that of the peers of Ireland at the time of the union, four spiritual lords, by rotation of sessions, and twenty-eight temporal peers for life, shall be the number to sit and vote in the house of lords; and one hundred commoners, viz. two for each county of Ireland; two for the city of Dublin; two for the city of Cork; and one for each of the thirty-two most considerable cities, towns, and boroughs, be the number of representatives of Ireland, in the house of commons of the parliament of the united kingdom."

The progress of the union bill in England, was not marked with the asperity of altercation which it had received in Ireland; and after bestowing on it the royal assent, the king declared, that he should "ever consider this great measure, as the happiest event of his reign."

By these articles it was also provided, that, for the space of twenty years after the union takes place, the contribution of Great Britain and Ireland respectively, towards the expenditure of the united kingdom in each year, shall be defrayed in the proportion of fifteen parts for Great Britain, and two parts for Ireland; this proportion, at the expiration of that time, to be subject to revision and regulation from other considerations.

The British parliament met early, chiefly for the purpose of enabling his majesty to avail himself of the voluntary services of the militia, to supply the army in Holland. A bill for that purpose was speedily enacted, though violently opposed by several members. After some financial arrangements, an adjournment was ordered; and, during the recess, some important communications occurred between the French and English governments.

Returning to the affairs of France, we may observe, that the French directory, in order to captivate the multitude, lulled them into a belief of the frantic resolution of an invasion of England; but that project, which, however, does not seem to have been ever seriously intended, was soon changed for another. This appears to have been the establishment of a colony in Egypt, and "to regenerate a country which was the first theatre of civilization in the universe." In order to carry on the farce, and to create alarm in England, the people were amused with ridiculous stories of rafts being constructed for the invasion of England, and troops were collected on the northern coast of France, while the navy of the republic were secretly repairing to Toulon. At length Bonaparte embarked on board the fleet, and proceeded to Malta, which surrendered after a slight resistance, he then proceeded on his voyage, and disembarked his troops in Egypt, in the month of July, 1798. After the reduction of Alexandria, Rosetta, and other fortresses, he proceeded to attack Cairo, which was defended by Mourad Bey, with a considerable body of Mamelukes. On the 23rd, the place was attacked and carried, though the Mamelukes exhibited determined valour. At Cairo, a proclamation was issued, appointing a provisional government for Egypt, in which the general promised to secure the pacha of Egypt in all his dignity and power. The beys, however, attempted to rally, and collected a considerable force near Cairo. On the 25th the French general attacked one of the posts at Lambabe, when three hundred of the enemy were killed. The celebrated battle of the Pyramids was fought on the succeeding day, which decided the fate of Egypt. Twenty-three beys, with all their forces, were completely defeated; two thousand of the Mamelukes were slain, and all their camels and baggage taken; while the loss of the French was only estimated at twenty or thirty killed, and one hundred and twenty wounded.

Egypt was now supposed to be completely subjugated; but the British ministry thought they could not politically suffer the establishment of a colony so near her East India possessions, and therefore concerted with the Porte, a project of general attack, to expel those dangerous neighbours from their new conquests. The principal preparations were made in Syria, under the pacha of Djezzar, who was to be supported with an army to traverse Asia Minor. The attack on the frontiers of Egypt, on the side of the desert of Syria, was to be favoured by a strong diversion towards the mouths of the Nile, and by different attacks executed by the wrecks of Mourad Bey's army in Upper Egypt, united to other hostile parties.

The execution of this plan, on the part of England, was committed to commodore sir Sidney Smith, who left Portsmouth the preceding autumn, on board the Tiger, and proceeded to the Levant, where he hastened the preparations for the campaign in Egypt. Commodore Hood continued to block up, with four ships of the line, and five frigates, the port of Alexandria, and the mouths of the Nile.

Bonaparte, informed that the arrival of commodore Smith was to be the signal of offensive operations, resolved to march into Syria, to destroy the preparations made by Djezzar. The two months which intervened, from the entire submission of Egypt, to the moment when the troops destined for the expedition of Syria were to march, were employed in finishing military surveys, confided to different officers, and in journies, which the scientific members of the different classes of the institute had undertaken.

During this survey, Bonaparte was informed of the movements of Djezzar, whom the grand signior had named pacha of Egypt. He had already sent a body of troops towards El-Arisch, at the entrance of the desert, on the side of Egypt. This general received orders to occupy and fortify Cattich, and general la Grange marched, with a demi-brigade, to take possession of this post on the same day that Bonaparte returned to Cairo; where he gave his last orders for the organization and march of the army of Syria, and regulated the command of the troops which were to remain in Egypt. The army consisted of four divisions of infantry, under the generals Kleber, Bonn, Lannes, and Regnier, amounting to ten thousand, besides cavalry, and artillery. The difficulty of transporting the artillery, constrained Bonaparte to provide these different divisions with pieces much below the ordinary proportion.

The garrisons intended to remain in Lower Egypt, were formed of the nineteenth demi-brigade, three battalions of the expedition of Syria, the nautic and Maltese legions; and the depots of cavalry. General Dugua had the command of Cairo, general Menou was stationed at Damietta. Adjutant-general Almeiras received, with the command of Damietta, orders to hasten the finishing of the fortifications. Alexandria, which was threatened by the English, and also menaced with the plague, was entrusted to general Marmont. General Desaix remained with his army in Upper Egypt, to keep in awe the remains of the Mamelukes, and hinder Mourad Bey from taking advantage of the expedition into Syria.

General Kleber's division embarked at Damietta, and was transported to Tinch, on the lake Meuzala. When the general arrived at Cattich, he was joined by general Regnier's advanced guard, and marched on to El-Arisch, the fortress of which was garrisoned by two thousand troops of the pacha of St. John d'Acre. The village of El-Arisch was carried with the bayonet, by Regnier's division; the Arnauts and Mangrabins, who defended it, after having made a brave resistance, withdrew precipitately into the fort. Scarcely was it blocked up by Regnier's division, when a reinforcement of infantry and cavalry, escorting a convoy of provisions, appeared in sight of El-Arisch, and encamped on a rising ground. Kleber came up at that moment, and approved of Regnier's project of surprising the camp of the Mamelukes during the night. This attack succeeded; the camp was carried, the corps of infantry cut in pieces, taken, or destroyed. A number of horses, camels, stores, and provisions, and the whole of the convoy fell into the hands of the French. The two other divisions of the army formed their junction, a few days after, at El-Arisch, and were joined at length, by Bonaparte. The fort of El-Arisch was cannonaded, and surrendered in two days.

The artillery necessary for the reduction of St. John d'Acre, could be transported only by sea, and Bonaparte had ventured its embarkation from Alexandria. Vice-admiral Perrée, with three frigates, had sailed during the night, to escort the gun-boats, and had orders to cruize before Jaffa. The secrecy and promptitude of the preparations for the expedition of Syria, and the celerity of the attack, surprized the Turks.

At Constantinople, the English, notwithstanding the new alliance, the important support of their naval forces, and the activity of sir Sidney Smith, could not obtain the means for the entire execution of the plan concerted for the attack on Egypt. By judicious management, however, Passwan Oglow, who claimed from the Turkish government to renew the haticheriff granted to his ancestors, became reconciled. The Ottoman Porte, now found itself relieved from a dangerous enemy, and concluded a treaty with Passwan, who swore solemnly on the Koran to be faithful to his engagements, and never to give cause of discontent to the Porte. A free pardon was also extended to Passwan, and he obtained the dignity of pacha.

In the mean time sir Sidney Smith gained intelligence of the first movements of Bonaparte, and endeavoured to counter-act his designs, by making attempts on Alexandria, which he bombarded, without further injury to the French, than sinking two transports. After this fruitless enterprize, he sailed to the assistance of the pacha of Syria, who at first did not think of defending himself in St. John d'Acre, meaning only to secure his retreat, and to convey away his women and treasure. The commodore anchored, with three frigates, in the road of Caiffa.

Kleber, with his division, was misled by the guides: the two divisions which followed him, were drawn astray by the tracks of the first. It was not till after forty-eight hours toil, and enduring the torments of burning thirst, that they reached the Kan Jodnesse, the first village of Palestine, on leaving the deserts, whence they discovered the cultivated plains of Gaza.

A corps of Mamelukes, under the command of Abdalla Pacha, which had encamped before Kan Jodnesse, had fallen back on Gaza: thither Bonaparte repaired, drove away the Mamelukes, and took possession of the town, where he found very considerable magazines of provisions, as well as stores.

It was at the town of Jaffa, anciently called Joppa, that Bonaparte

Bonaparte met with the first resistance: the way to it was covered with hillocks of moving sand, which the cavalry traversed with difficulty; the camels slowly and painfully proceeded, and for about three leagues it was necessary to treble the teams to the artillery. Hordes of Arabs hovered around the army, without, however, doing any injury; and the advanced guard under Kleber, reached the town on the third day. Jaffa was found to be surrounded with a wall without ditches, flanked by good towers mounting cannon. Two forts defended the port and the road, and it appeared well armed. The garrison having retired within the place, the main attack was made on the south side. The whole army having come up, and batteries being established, a practicable breach was soon effected, and the town taken by assault. Many of the garrison on this occasion (which is a very common thing) were put to the sword; but the greater part flying into the mosques, and imploring mercy from their pursuers, their lives were granted. The Turks, it is said, received orders to give no quarter; and three days afterwards, Bonaparte, to shew them that he could be rigorous, as well as merciful, if necessity required it, having three thousand eight hundred prisoners, ordered them to be drawn up, and every tenth man to be selected, who were marched to a rising ground near Jaffa, and immediately shot. The remainder were set at liberty, with instructions to inform the grand signior, that the French general had only put every tenth person to death, and that he had pardoned the rest. The Turks, it should be observed, did not attempt to take any prisoners, but massacred every Frenchman that fell into their hands (e).

After making Jaffa and its port the principal depôt for the artillery and stores which he expected from Damietta and Alexandria, Bonaparte marched upon St. John d'Acre, with the three divisions of Kleber, Bonn, and Lannes. That of Regnier composed the rear-guard, at two days' distance from the army, which he had orders to rejoin at St. John d'Acre. The French advanced guard discovered near Zetta, a body of cavalry under Abdalla Pacha, who to retard the march of the army, had taken a position on the heights of Korsum, flanking himself by the mountain of Naplousium, the ancient Samaria, on which several thousand Naplousians were posted.

While Kleber, Bonn, and Murat, endeavoured to bring Abdalla to an engagement, which he avoided, Lannes' division marched upon the right, and cut off the pacha from the Naplousians; the latter fled; but the light infantry, who pursued them, having entangled themselves in the defiles, the Naplousians rallied, and attacked in their turn, pursuing the French to the outlines of the defiles. Barthelemy the commander of the demi-brigade was killed. Two days after, Kleber took possession of Caiffa, at the foot of Mount Carmel. The advanced guard of this division discovered, on arriving at Caiffa, the division of the English squadron which had cast anchor. The boats of the Tiger, which was one of the ships, approached the coast, reconnoitred their advanced guard, at the foot of Mount Carmel, and endeavoured, by their fire, to harass them.

Sir Sidney Smith had elevated the courage of the pacha of St. John d'Acre, by sending him an old engineer, who had facilitated his deliverance from the Temple. Colonel Philippeaux, caused the fortress to be repaired; and the captain of the Theseus furnished him with many necessary materials for the reparation of this ancient bulwark of Syria. At this instant, the fleet of gun-boats, which had on board the greatest part of Bonaparte's battering pieces, and his stores, fell into the hands of the English. This loss was irreparable to the French, and decided the fate of St. John d'Acre. The cannon and stores were instantly landed, and the vessels that transported them were armed and employed to harass the French posts, and disturb their convoys and communications.

Having drawn back the external posts, Bonaparte encamped his army on an insulated height, bordering upon the sea, which commands, on the western side, a plain of about a league and three quarters, bounded by the mountains situated between St. John d'Acre, and the river Jordan. After taking possession of Sasset, Nazareth, and Schaffham, to clear the passes on the road to Damascus and Cafferelli, he reconnoitred St. John D'Acre more accurately with his officers of artillery, and came to a resolution of attacking the front on the east of the town. The trench was opened at nine hundred feet from the place, and the French proceeded with such activity, that the ninth day, after the opening of the trench, batteries and counter-batteries, mounted as at Jaffa, had pierced the tower, while a branch of the mine had been pushed on to blow up the counterscarp. The mine was sprung, but it only made a hole in the glacis: the French thought the counterscarp injured. The ditch appeared to be of no considerable depth, but they found another of about fifteen feet deep, which was almost half filled up with the rubbish of the breach; they plunged into it, but found themselves separated by the counterscarp from the troops which were to support them. Mailly, Lascelles, and Langier, the officers who headed the attack, all perished. The Turks, who had abandoned the tower, re-entered it, and the French retreated to their trenches.

The failure of success in this first attack, and the hopes which Djezzar entertained of being supported by a body of Naplousians and Mangrabins, induced him to make several brisk sallies, in which he was repulsed with considerable loss. Bonaparte had not yet received the heavy artillery, for which he had sent to Damietta, to replace that which he had lost. He once more endeavoured to open a breach in the same tower, which the Turks had filled with wood, bales of cotton, and bags of earth: the tower was set on fire, but all attempts to reach it were ineffectual. At length sir Sidney Smith, in concert with Djezzar, made a considerable sally in three columns, at the head of which were the marines. The intention was to destroy the works nearest the place, and chiefly the mine, which led under the counterscarp: this perilous attack was entrusted to the gallant captain Aldfield, who had distinguished himself at the taking of the Cape of Good Hope: he broke the head of the column of the centre, and threw himself first on the entrance of the mine; where he was mortally wounded, and carried off by the French grenadiers. He expired in the arms of the enemy, amidst the warmest testimonies of their regard and esteem. The three columns received much injury by the fire from the batteries and parallels, and the intermediate space was strewed with their dead and dying.

The English had the misfortune to behold, under their colours, united to those of Djezzar, the French, who were wounded and prisoners, massacred in cold blood by the Turks, a practice too common among those barbarians. This practice being well known to Bonaparte, no doubt occasioned him to act more vigorously against his prisoners than he would otherwise have done. Sir Sidney Smith had softened the fate of French prisoners at Constantinople, and therefore lamented the multiplied horrors which were committed under his inspection at St. John d'Acre.

The corps of Mamelukes which had been assembled had become considerable, so that it was thought necessary to send against them a corps of observation, which was entrusted to general Kleber. The first troops of this numerous Turkish army had already passed the river Jordan. General Junot endeavoured to reach them with his light infantry, and a few cavalry, when he was surrounded and attacked by about three thousand horse, and made his retreat to Kaff Cana.

General Kleber left the camp of St. John d'Acre, with the remainder of his division, to join general Junot at Nazareth; and directing his march upon the heights of Louby, reached Sed-Jara, when four thousand Turkish and Arabian cavalry, surrounded the French, and were preparing to charge them. Kleber routed the Turkish cavalry, which fled across the Jordan. A few days after, the whole of the army destined to relieve St. John d'Acre, formed its junction in the plain of Fouli.

The French, after various prodigies of valour, were obliged to yield to superior numbers, and to the resolution which the Turks displayed amidst their ruins. From their high walls, they persevered in a well-directed and destructive fire. After their multiplied and irreparable losses, it was found almost impossible to reduce a place defended with so much intrepidity, supported and protected by the English squadron under sir Sidney Smith.

Bonaparte, whom Fortune had so often favoured, was still anxious to try the chance at arms, and marched at two in the morning, on the 10th of May, to the foot of the breach, which was mounted by the grenadiers of the seventy-fifth and nineteenth demi-brigades, and the carabineers of the second of light infantry. His intention was to surprize the Turks, and to establish himself in force in the breach. General Verdier marched at the head of the grenadiers; the first posts were killed on the spot, but the garrison held firm behind the new entrenchments, which stopped his impetuous attack, and forced the French to retreat. They renewed it the same evening, and the grenadiers of the twenty-fifth demi-brigade, having requested to to mount to the assault, the combat began again on the breach with redoubled fury. The besieged, warned of this last attack, had reinforced a second and third line of artillery, which the grenadiers could not force.

(e) See the French account of the action at Jaffa.

In these assaults, the loss on each side was considerable, but that of the French was particularly so. Adjutant-general Fouler, Venoux, and general Bonn, were killed, and many other field-officers dangerously wounded. Determined, at length, to raise the siege, Bonaparte first ordered his sick and wounded to be sent away. To keep the besieged in check, he made use of the rest of his ammunition, and increased the fire of his cannon and mortars. Djezzar remarking these dispositions for retreat, made frequent sallies, which were repulsed with vigour. The aspect of the field of carnage was horrible; the ditches, and the reverses of the parapets were filled with the slain, the air was infected, and the proposition for a suspension of arms to bury the dead, remained unanswered.

Bonaparte, in a proclamation, announced to his army the raising of the siege, and resolved to return to Egypt, to defend its approach in the season of landing, against the forces assembled at Rhodes. The raising of the siege was executed in good order, and the very day on which the army began its march, general Le Grange repulsed two sallies, and forced the Turks back into the town. General Lannes' division led the march, Regnier's division evacuated the trenches. Kleber formed a strong rear-guard, whilst General Junot covered the left flank. Bonaparte threw into the sea the pieces of artillery, which he could not carry back through the desert, and embraced every means of transporting to Jaffa his field-pieces, and his sick and wounded.

This convoy sailed from Jaffa a few days after, for Damietta, but fell into the hands of the English commodore, who, having received intelligence of the retreat, sent in chase of the three French frigates, and lay along the coast to harrass the march.

Djezzar knew not till day-break that the trenches were evacuated: the Turks took possession of the works, and, following the traces of the army, found a few pieces of the artillery buried in the sand. The French army continued its march, ravaging the country, and depriving the Turks of those resources which might possibly have been serviceable to them in their approach to the frontiers of Egypt. Kleber formed the rear with his division, which, after crossing the deserts, embarked at Tinah, for Damietta. Bonaparte left a strong garrison at Cattich, and entered Cairo with his army, twenty-six days after raising the siege.

Thus terminated the campaign of Syria; and notwithstanding his misfortunes at the siege of St. John d'Acre, losing by battle, and by sickness, almost a quarter of his troops, Bonaparte was satisfied that he had fulfilled the principal object of his expedition, by weakening the army of the enemy, and retarding its operations during the most favourable season.

Sir Sidney Smith, pursuing with ardour the execution of the plan of campaign against Egypt, found an increase of zeal and activity on the part of the Ottomans. Seid Mustapha Pacha assembled in the Isle of Rhodes, the troops destined for the attack of Alexandria: European officers directed the details of the enterprize, and the combined English and Turkish fleet only waited for a convoy which the Captain Pacha, anchored in the Dardanelles, was to dispatch to Rhodes.

Previous to the return of the French army from Syria into the strong places of Lower Egypt, general Dugua, commander of Cairo, had detached Lanuffe, Duranteau, and d'Estrees, against different hordes of Arabs, whom they surprized and defeated in several rencounters. Acts of rigour were exercised; villages were consumed to stifle the sedition; but the presence of Bonaparte completely re-established order. He applied himself principally to repair the losses sustained by the four divisions, and the cavalry which had marched with him into Syria. He completed the different corps, and so perfectly re-established their organization, that within three weeks after the return of those troops to their quarters, they were in a condition to commence fresh attacks upon the Turks.

The movements of the Mamelukes and the Arabs proclaimed the projects of the allies, and the approach of their fleet. Desaix, who was charged with the expulsion of the Mamelukes from Upper Egypt, was preparing for an expedition into the Oäsis, when he was informed that the Mamelukes had been remarkably hostile, and formed themselves into two divisions; part of them having endeavoured to form a junction with Ibrahim Bey, and the others to form a junction with the Arabs. These two corps of Mamelukes did not reach their destination; the first was surprized at Sababier, by general le Grange; their camp baggage, and seventeen hundred camels fell into the hands of the French, the remainder was dispersed in the desert. Mourad Bey, having been preceded on the Natron Lakes by general Murat, who, after having driven away the bands of Arabs, marched to meet him, retreated towards the pyramids of Gizeh.

Bonaparte, informed of this counter-march, conceived it practicable to cut off the retreat of Mourad Bey, and marched from Cairo with his select troops, ordering general Murat to come and join him: he reached the pyramids the day that Mourad Bey had left them, on his retreat to Fayum; but now a more serious business demanded his attention; he had received advice from Alexandria, that a Turkish fleet of one hundred sail had anchored in the Road of Aboukir; and another dispatch informed him that a body of three thousand Turks had landed with artillery on the shore of the peninsula, and carried by storm the fort of Aboukir. Bonaparte dispatched orders to all his generals to march towards the place of landing, and to watch the Mamelukes and Arabs. The advanced guard of general Murat, had orders to pass the Nile, and the moveable column which general Menou had marched upon the Natron Lakes, with the park of artillery and the staff, formed their junction at Rhamania.

Upper Egypt was occupied by Desaix, who continued the pursuit of Mourad Bey. He had orders to watch the position of Cairo, and consult his operations with general Dugua, and general Reignier. Bonaparte ordered Kleber to march to Rosetta, with a part of his division, and sent reinforcements to that place, under the orders of general Menou.

The Turks, after the surrender of fort Aboukir, had landed their artillery, having possession of the peninsula, and had begun to entrench themselves and form magazines: they had opened a communication with Rosetta, by cutting the pontoons, and their force, which increased daily, was estimated at about fifteen thousand men; but they appeared to be waiting for still greater reinforcements, and the junction concerted with Mourad Bey, in order to invest Alexandria.

Bonaparte took post at the village of Birket, at the point of one of the angles of the Lake Madie; and, seeing that the Turks thought only of fortifying and maintaining themselves in the peninsula, he determined to attack them. The army, after having quitted the position of Birket, assembled at the wells between Alexandria and Aboukir; and Bonaparte, having moved his head quarters to Alexandria, and surveyed the new works which general Marmont had improved, formed his disposition of attack. Kleber had followed the movement of the army, with a part of his division; and general Menou undertook to cannonade such little embarkations as the Turks might send into the lake to harass him on his left.

Mustapha Pacha defended the entrance of the peninsula, by two lines of troops, and by imperfect intrenchments. He had placed his first line half a league in front of the fort of Aboukir; the right of this line was flanked by the sea, and occupied by about one thousand men: a village at a small distance was defended by a corps of one thousand men, and four pieces of cannon. The left of this first line was detached and insulated at the distance of twelve hundred yards before the centre; and a few gun-boats, drawn up on the inner shore, flanked on the left the interval between the first and second lines. The latter was more advantageously posted: the centre occupied the redoubt, which had been taken from the French at the moment of landing, and which had since been connected with the sea-shore by an intrenchment, behind which was the right: the left occupied the mounds of sand, and the internal shore was flanked by gun-boats. Seven thousand men, and twelve pieces of cannon, defended this second line. The squadron was anchored at a league and a half distant in the road of Aboukir.

The French army, which was only two hours distant from the first posts of the Turks, early in the morning began its march in two columns, preceded by a strong advanced guard. As soon as the armies were in sight of each other, Bonaparte formed his columns of attack, and general d'Estaign carried with the bayonet the entrenched height, which formed the support of the right of the Turks

Turks. At the same time Lannes' division marched upon the left of the first line: general Murat cut off the retreat of the two wings, which were attacked by detached squadrons, and marched right to the centre with his cavalry. Almost the whole of the first line, dislodged and surrounded by this manœuvre, perished by the fire, or were drowned: a part only of the right fell back on the village, which was attacked and carried. The Turks were pursued to their second position, which was much stronger than the first. The redoubt formed the head of this position, which the pacha, who had no other retreat, was prepared to defend with vigour, having still eight or nine thousand men remaining.

Perceiving the principal force of the Turks was at the centre, Bonaparte changed his position. He detached the cavalry to the right, and directed the attacks of the infantry on the entrenchments of their right, disposing a reserve to storm the redoubt, at the moment when the attacks by the left wings should have succeeded. After briskly cannonading the redoubt and the entrenchments, he began the storm. General Fugieres, at the head of the eighteenth demi-brigade, marched a column along the shore: the Turks, seeing the French approach the entrenchments, sallied out, and attacked the columns: the combatants fought man to man, and the Turks were repulsed—the French followed them, and threw themselves into the entrenchments; but they were stopped by the fire of the redoubt. General Fugieres lost an arm, and the column was forced to fall back to the village. The cavalry, which had come up to the redoubt, had charged several times with impetuosity; but they could not sustain the heavy fire of the redoubt, and that of the gun-boats. Du Vivier was killed; adjutant-general Roiza, and Bessieres renewed the attack. Letour sprung first into the entrenchment, without being followed, and was killed. To decide the action, Bonaparte ordered general Lannes to march to the redoubt at the head of two battalions: seizing the moment when the Turks sallied from their entrenchments, he attacked the redoubt; the battalion of the twenty-second and twenty-ninth demi-brigades leaped into the ditch, climbed the parapet, and carried the work. Mustapha Pacha now strove, but in vain, to rally his troops, which were forced on every point. General Murat traversed the positions of the Turks, and pushing as far as the ditches of the fort of Aboukir, completed the confusion that had taken place in their ranks. The Turks fled on every side, and threw themselves into the sea; the greater part could not reach their vessels; and the remainder of the army, except the garrison, surrounded and taken with Mustapha Pacha perished in the ocean.

This victory was attended with considerable loss to the French, who had a great number wounded; among whom was general Murat, and the chief of brigade Cretin, who died of their wounds. The fort of Aboukir, summoned to surrender the day after the battle, was defended with desperate fury; the Turks scorning the idea of a capitulation with arms in their hands. After eight days of fierce bombardment, however, when the castle was nothing but a heap of ruins, the son of the pacha, his kyaia, and two thousand men, threw down their arms, and surrendered themselves prisoners: the French found in the fort eighteen hundred men killed, and three hundred wounded.

Sir Sidney Smith, it is said, arriving at Aboukir with the last sail of the convoy, was a witness of this retreat, without having it in his power, as at St. John d'Acre, to revive the hopes of the Turks. His squadron, united to that of Fetah Bey, served only to gather up the wrecks of an expedition from which the Porte had expected the extermination of the remains of the French army.

Bonaparte returned to Alexandria the day after the battle; he had received intelligence of the first reverse which the armies of the republic had experienced in Italy and on the Rhine, and of the struggles which were taking place in France. Resolving to return to Europe, he meditated on his departure in secret. Thinking the victory of Aboukir was an honourable termination of the war in the East, he consecrated the memory of the principal officers he had lost there as well as at the siege of St. John d'Acre, by annexing their names to different forts repaired, or newly constructed for the defence of the town and ports of Alexandria. On his return to Cairo, he employed himself in re-establishing the police of the country, and cultivated the affections of the people by new attentions to their religious prejudices. Two commissions of artists left Cairo, with a strong escort, to visit the monuments of Upper Egypt. To accomplish other designs, Bonaparte ventured to quit his army, and trust his fortune to the waves: he disclosed his projects only to Berthier; and gave orders to admital Gantheaume to prepare two frigates, without informing him of the destination of those vessels: the persons on whom he conferred the dangerous favour of accompanying him, were the generals Lannes, Marmont, Murat, and Andreossi; together with Monge and Berthollet: Bessieres, and his guides, received sealed notes, which they were to open at a certain day, hour, and place. A similar packet, to be opened twenty-four hours after the departure of the vessels, was destined for general Kleber, containing his nomination to the chief command, and to Dessaix that of Upper Egypt.

It was not till the 24th of August, that Bonaparte, waiting for a favourable wind, left the road of Aboukir, and sailed for the island of Corsica. He anchored at Ajaccio, the first of September, and left it seven days after. His two frigates having been chased by an English squadron, he would not suffer admiral Gantheaume, who saw no hopes of safety, to turn back to Corsica, but was resolved to trust to fortune. He avoided the roads of Toulon, on account of the cruizers which might be hovering round it, entered the port of Frejus, and landed on the 14th of September, the forty-seventh day after his departure from the shores of Egypt.

Shortly after Bonaparte returned from Egypt, a new revolution took place in the government of France; the directory was displaced, the council of elders was dissolved (f), and Bonaparte was speedily appointed First Consul, according to a new constitution which had been framed (principally by the abbé Sieyes, it is said,) and which had been accepted by some of the legislative authorities. To induce the people to consent to this change, by which Bonaparte was invested with the supreme authority, he promised to take effectual measures to terminate the miseries and calamities of war. In pursuance of this promise, on the very day on which he entered on his new dignity, he addressed a dispatch immediately to the king of Great Britain, in which he expressed a wish to contribute effectually to a general pacification; and in a second communication afterwards transmitted by M. Talleyrand, to the English ministry, proposed "an immediate suspension of arms, and that plenipotentiaries on each side should repair to Dunkirk, or any other town as advantageously situated, for the quickness of the respective communications, and who should sedulously apply themselves to effect the re-establishment of peace and harmony between the French republic and England." The British ministry, however, manifested no inclination to accede to the overture, conceiving, perhaps, that the new government of France had not yet acquired sufficient stability to engage in a treaty; and encouraged by the success which had attended the arms of the allies in the preceding campaign, they hoped they should be able still more effectually to humble and weaken France by a continuance of hostile measures.

But a short time elapsed after the consular government had been established in France, when the state of the newly acquired possessions in Egypt became deplorable. The dissentions in Syria, between the grand vizier, who commanded the Ottoman army, and Djezzar, the pacha of St. John d'Acre, had suspended, for a time, the fate of the French army. Djezzar, who would have fallen an easy prey to the impetuosity of the French army under Bonaparte, had not the valour of sir Sidney Smith relieved him from all apprehension, directed his arms against his deliverers, and the grand vizier was compelled, for some time, to employ his forces in opposing the hostilities of this rebellious and ungrateful subject. At this period, a correspondence commenced between sir Sidney Smith, as minister plenipotentiary of his Britannic majesty, near the Ottoman Porte, and the French general Kleber. Sir Sidney Smith, in an epistle to the general, informed him, that a peace could never be effected till Egypt was evacuated, but that it might be accelerated by the speedy execution of that preliminary to any negociation; and expressed his wishes that their official communications might be productive of the evacuation of that country, which would lead the way to a definitive arrangement.

(f) The manner of Bonaparte's dissolving the council of elders, was truly embarrassing and curious. When he presented himself at the door of the assembly, accompanied by several officers and grenadiers, he advanced towards the president. A vehement agitation immediately arose among part of the members, who darted precipitately from their seats towards Bonaparte, insulted him, and pushed him back with violence: at this instant he was assailed by cries from different parts of the hall, of "Down with the tyrant! kill him! outlaw him! This is the moment to deliver France!" A member attempted to stab him with a dagger, but the blow was warded off by a grenadier. The vehemence of the members was not confined to words: several started from their seats, and rushed towards the door, imprecating vengeance, and practising menacing gesticulations. Bonaparte, however, preserved his usual address, and a few days relieved him from these apparent insurmountable difficulties.

To the letter of the English plenipotentiary, general Kleber signified his disposition to engage in such a negociation; and, after some delay, a conference was held between the commissaries appointed by Kleber, and sir Sidney Smith, on board the Tiger. During these transactions, the grand vizier sent detachments from his army encamped at Gaza, to besiege El-Arisch, of which he obtained possession the seventh day after the attack. An armistice had been adjusted in the interval, but the vessel which was dispatched with the notice, having been prevented by a tempest from approaching the coast, the siege and capture of this avant-post of Egypt took place. After several conferences, Kleber finding that no other conditions could be obtained, than the free evacuation of Egypt, agreed to a definitive arrangement for this object. Being thus critically situated, having an immense multitude to oppose without, and enemies within, hardly less formidable in the disaffection of the Egyptians, and in the plague which had begun its ravages, and which daily diminished his army, he gave orders to assent to a convention for the evacuation of the country, which was signed at the camp of the grand vizier, before El-Arisch, the 24th of January, 1800.

As lord Grenville's answer to the notes transmitted by Bonaparte to the king and the English ministry, peremptorily refused all negociations for peace, except on the condition of the re-establishment of monarchy, it was evident that hostilities must immediately ensue: but while the French nation were waiting some dire disasters from the menaces of the coalesced parties, the Russian army, to which so much importance had been attached the preceding year, and which, it was confidently stated, was shortly to be renewed with at least fifty thousand men, began its retreat into Poland, in consequence of peremptory orders from the emperor Paul, which reached general Suwarrow, whose situation was acknowledged to be critical, about the middle of January. But though the emperor of Russia's continental co-operation was to be less extensive than the last campaign, the emperor of Germany continued a faithful ally. Bonaparte, when he lured the British ministry to negociation, had adopted the same experiment on the Austrian cabinet, through the means of the archduke Charles, whose inclination for peace was well known. But all the efforts of prince Charles were defeated by the hostile resolutions of the empress and the minister Thugut. The message of the king of Great Britain to the parliament, of the 13th of February, stating, that his majesty was at that moment, employed in making engagements with the emperor of Germany, the elector of Bavaria, and other princes of the empire, to support the common cause, and asking preliminary supplies, also confirmed the designs of the British cabinet; and every prospect of peace vanished, on the arrival of general Kray, the 16th of February, to supersede the archduke Charles in the command of the army in Suabia. As appeal was again made to the sword, the French government, conquered in negociation, was obliged to accept the challenge, and the greatest preparations were made for opening the campaign in a vigorous manner.

The territory of Genoa was now in the possession of the French; and it was as much the object of the ambition of the house of Austria, as it was that of the solicitude of the French republic. When general Massena was appointed to the command of the republican forces in Italy, he found it in a most deplorable condition; not only reduced to half its number by the sword, but so oppressed with disease and famine, that the loss sustained by those dire ravages, during a winter's abode in the territories of Genoa, amounted nearly to twenty thousand men; he had therefore, in a great measure, to re-create the army of which he went to take the command; and this, by prudence and perseverance, he in some degree effected. Massena had applied for a reinforcement, but instead of the sixty thousand men he had been promised, he found himself with only twenty-four thousand, which he organized as well as he was able; but the French army was so situated, that they had only the choice of two evils, that of entering the field against a very superior force, under the command of Melas, or of being blocked up in Genoa, which was destitute of provisions, and which, if not relieved, he apprehended must be reduced by famine.

The appearance of the British fleet before Genoa on the 5th of April, was the signal for the commencement of hostilities. The communication by sea was now cut off. A few days preceding, a certain quantity of wheat and other provisions had entered the port of Genoa; had the blockade therefore taken place sooner, the town must have immediately surrendered. Though the Austrians were far superior in number to the French, the latter achieved prodigies of valour, encountering at the same time a more formidable enemy, which was famine. The Austrians were not exempt from the effects of this scarcity; for as the residence of the prisoners in Genoa, to which they had been sent by the French, might have been attended with danger, in the state of despair to which the people were driven; Massena sent them on board vessels in the port, and included them in the list of the people to whom the Ligurian government was commissioned to distribute provisions. Of this distribution, wretched as it was, it might readily be supposed, that these unfortunate men were not equally partakers. Hardly can an idea be formed of the intense hunger to which they became a prey. Their shoes and knapsacks, converted into food, served for a momentary prolongation of their miseries; and such was the state of desperation to which they were driven, that the government could not venture to send any one on board, lest the messenger should become the victim of their raging appetites. Their lamentations resounded throughout the port, assailing the ears of wretches scarcely more fortunate than themselves. At length, the miserable victims expired in great numbers, amidst the most deplorable sufferings, and many shrunk from them, by seeking a voluntary death in the waves which washed their vessels.

When reduced to the defensive, no opportunity escaped Massena of harrassing, by sallies from his lines, the enemy by whom he was surrounded. In one of these engagements, the Austrians lost upwards of four thousand men; but in an engagement, in which the French general lost three of his best commanders, all farther operations on his part were put a stop to, and the Austrians penetrated to the walls of Genoa, without meeting with any further effective resistance. The French territory was then invaded by the Imperialists, and Melas, the Austrian general, left in possession of the whole department of the Maritime Alps; so that the Austrians had gained the entire possession of Italy, except the city of Genoa.

The campaign on the Rhine began towards the close of April. General Moreau, whose military skill had been demonstrated on many occasions, on reading his orders, dispatched a courier to Paris, signifying, that if those orders were to be rigidly followed, he must decline the place of commander-in-chief, and take a secondary situation. He accompanied his message with a plan of his own formation; his dismission was refused, and the execution of the plan submitted to the courage and skill of the framer. The passage of the Rhine into the Brisgaw was a military stratagem to draw the attention of the Imperialists to that point; and Kray was so little prepared for the manœuvres of Moreau, that a passage was effected without any considerable loss. The French commander Lecourbe had taken a position on the right side, and after an engagement, in which he made eight hundred prisoners, gained possession, by capitulation, of the otherwise impregnable fortress of Hohortwell.

Lecourbe, according to orders, directed his course on the rear of the Austrian army at Stockach, while Moreau, collecting his centre and left divisions, marched upon the village of Engen, where general Kray, no longer deceived with respect to the plan of attack, had assembled the main body of his army. Lecourbe, in his march, met with a division of the Austrians near Stockach, which he attacked, routed, and pursued beyond the town. Moreau, willing to favour this movement, attacked the Austrians at Engen, and after a desperate engagement, seized all the posts of the Imperialists, who, half surrounded, made their retreat during the night into Moskirch. The loss of the Austrians Austrians on this day, amounted to upwards of ten thousand men, of which four thousand were prisoners. The loss of magazines and baggage was likewise immense.

A succession of defeats at length compelled general Kray to concentrate his forces around Ulm, while general Moreau established his head quarters at Memingen, occupying the country between the rivers Yell and Lech. In this position, two divisions of the French army sustained an attack from the whole force of general Kray. After an obstinate resistance, the French resumed offensive operations, and forced the Austrians to a precipitate retreat across the Danube during the night, adding two thousand prisoners to those they had already taken. Another engagement ensued, the consequence of which was, that the retreat of the Austrians to the left of the Danube, made the French masters of the electorate of Bavaria to the right; Ulm was invested, and their head quarters established without further opposition at Munich.

The French army of reserve, which had been forming at Dijon, now began its march towards Italy. It was composed of fifty thousand men, and received reinforcements daily. The existence of such an army near Dijon was not generally credited; and the enemy fell into the snare which had been prepared for them. The chief consul, who had publicly declared his intention of taking the command, while the situation of the army at Genoa required his immediate assistance, seemed to countenance the delusion, by remaining at Paris. Bonaparte left that city on the 5th of May, and arrived at Dijon, from whence, after reviewing the troops cantoned there, he proceeded to Genoa. Remaining a short time in the Pays de Vaud, he joined the army of reserve, who were assembled at the fort of Mount St. Bernard. The progress and victories of the French army exceeded all conception. They passed the Alps, obtained the battle of Romano, passed the river Tessino, entered the city of Milan, and took Pavia and Piacenza.

That he might enter the valley of Aosto, Bonaparte found it necessary to traverse, for more than twenty Italian miles, the mountain called the Great Saint Bernard, situated between those of Simplon and Mont Blanc. From Martinach to St. Peter's, the road, though extremely bad, was not absolutely untrodden; human abodes, vegetation, and pasturage were found: but after passing this region, nature presented no object to the eye, but snow and naked rocks. From Saint Peter's, it is about three leagues to the summit of St. Bernard, by a road which is impassable by two men a-breast. A monastery presents itself at the top of this mountain, from the founder of which it derives its name. The tenants, highly celebrated for rescuing and restoring travellers who have strayed, or are benumbed, or even buried in the snow, were on this occasion made auxiliaries to Bonaparte, who was not now to be taught how much any circumstance, producing an appearance of dramatic effect, would animate his own followers, and impose on the rest of mankind. The progress of the soldiery had hitherto been extremely singular. For transporting the artillery, general Marmont, and brigadier general Gassendi, contrived two ingenious devices: the first was, to hollow out trunks of trees like canoes, in which were deposited the artillery and mortars, then a hundred men harnessing themselves to a cable, dragged the piece along, while others, furnished with handspikes, to prevent its falling over the precipices, directed its course. The other expedient was the use of sledges on castors; the gun-carriages being taken to pieces, were transported separately, except the carriages of four-pounders, which were placed on a kind of litter, and conveyed entire. The caissons were emptied, and the ammunition, stowed in chests, borne by men or mules. Every particular in the expedition hitherto savoured of romance: the solitude of the scene, the concurrence of individual efforts to the general advantage, which constituted every man a hero; the singularity of the route, and the importance of its results, all aided the predisposition to lofty contemplations, which the most judicious travellers have observed to prevail in mountainous countries. While the troops were thus animated, and their imaginations exalted, Bonaparte had contrived that even the ordinary solace of eating, should harmonize with the general sublimity of the region of sentiment. By his orders, and at his expence, the monks of Saint Bernard had prepared a feast for the whole army; and when the fatigued soldiers reached the heights of the monastic abode, tables spread, as if by enchantment, on the snow, and well furnished with viands, and delicious wines, were suddenly beheld; and the holy fathers humbly solicited the army to partake of their humble fare.

When they descended from St. Bernard to Verney, the first village in Piedmont, their fatigue was diminished, but their danger was augmented. For about a league, a road is formed on a rugged mountain; the horseman there must lead or follow his beast, as he cannot walk a-breast without the peril of falling into an abyss: on one side, the road is bounded with tremendous precipices; on the other, mountains of snow, suspended over the head of the passenger, threaten to descend in thundering avelanches, and hurry him, and every opposing object, in their irresistible course. In the descent, some of the soldiers adopted the scheme of sliding over the polished snow, to abridge their toil. The general himself, it is said, set the example; and many who followed it, reached in a few minutes, a small plain at the bottom, at which they could not have arrived by the regular path, in less time than several hours. During this whole journey, no other loss was sustained than a piece of artillery, and three men carried away by an avelanche, and four or five horses, by falling down the precipices. As they descended, the air gradually became milder, and grass and flowers again relieved their eyes; and in half an hour afterwards, the heat was found to be intolerable: in consequence of which the army experienced, in one day, the three seasons of winter, spring, and summer. Soon after this circumstance, the French received intelligence, by means of the intercepted correspondence of the Austrian general Melas, of the fate of their army in Genoa.

It was not till every hope of succour had vanished, and the French general Massena had seen fifteen thousand of the inhabitants of Genoa perish from absolute hunger, that he would deign to enter into a negociation for the delivery of the place. This negociation was concluded on the 4th of May, the principal article of which stated, that the army of Genoa, amounting to upwards of eight thousand men, should enter France by the way of Nice, and the rest be conveyed by sea to Antibes; and that the Genoese and other Italian inhabitants of Genoa, should be permitted to remove themselves and their effects to any place which suited their inclination.

The Austrian general Otto, with thirty battalions, quitted Genoa, to oppose the progress of the French army, that was marching towards Piedmont. The Austrians were in possession of Casteggio, which they defended with upwards of fifteen thousand men. The shock was dreadful, and victory was a long time doubtful. Casteggio was taken and re-taken several times. The Austrians at length gave way, leaving behind them about three thousand dead and wounded, with six thousand prisoners, and were pursued by the French as far as Voghera.

But this victory was in a few days followed by one of much greater extent. Unable to impede the progress of the French by partial detachments, general Melas, who was now blockaded in Piedmont, assembled the whole of his forces between Alessandria and Tortona, that he might crush the enemy by one stroke, or open himself a way across the French army, to join the Austrian divisions on the Mincio. After detaching different corps from the main army, to strengthen various posts, and defend the passages of the river, Bonaparte, with the remainder, marched to meet the Austrians at Alessandria: the French accordingly met the advanced guard of the Austrians at St. Julian's, which they evacuated to take post at Marengo; from which post they were driven, and compelled to retire beyond the Bormida. The French were at first surprized at seeing the Austrians abandon a situation in which they had so great a superiority of numbers, and it was conjectured that they intended either to pass the Po, or the Tessino, or to march by the territory of Genoa and Bobbio. But while dispositions were made to frustrate these attempts, the advanced guard of the French was attacked, and the Austrians, by the display of their forces, manifested their intention of giving battle. The troops under the command of general Victor were immediately ranged for engagement; a part formed the centre, which occupied the village of Marengo; the other composed the left wing, extending to the Bormida, and general Lannes' division the right wing. The army, formed in two lines, had its wings supported by a numerous body of heavy cavalry.

The Austrians began the engagement on all points. The centre of the French was soon compelled to fall back, and the the Austrians advanced upon Marengo. A dreadful carnage ensued; but the Austrians, reinforced, continued to advance, and gained possession of the village. Part of the centre of the French gave way, and quitted the field in disorder. The right wing was attacked by two lines of infantry, which marched against it with a formidable artillery. On the point of being flanked by a considerable body, they were supported for a moment by a brigade of dragoons; but the retreat of the centre obliged it, at length, to follow the same movement. The army could only be saved by a body of reserve under general Dessaix. This division was not yet ready for action, and Bonaparte, seeing the necessity of gaining time, advanced towards the right wing, in order to retard its movement. The retreat was, however, made under the fire of eighty pieces of artillery. The carnage was again dreadful, but the French preserved their flanks, and instantly supplied the place of those who fell by fresh troops.

Victory now seemed to declare in favour of the Austrians, whose numerous cavalry covered the plain, supported by several squadrons of light artillery. At this critical moment, the grenadiers of the consular guard marched to support the right, the only column that had continued firm. They advanced, and resolutely sustained three successive charges. At this moment, came up Monier's division, which made part of the corps de reserve. This division was ordered to attack the battalions which protected the Austrian cavalry, part of which were in pursuit of the centre and left of the French. At the plain of St. Juliano, the reserve under Dessaix was drawn up in two lines, supported by the artillery under Marmont, and by the cavalry under Kellerman. Behind this corps the fugitives of the centre and left formed; the presence of Bonaparte, who rapidly flew from rank to rank, re-animated the soldiers, and at four in the afternoon, the battle, which had raged for seven hours, was recommenced with extraordinary vigour and effect.

The Austrians, secure of the victory, having routed two-thirds of the French army, intended to surround the remainder, not considering the division yet unattacked. They had improvidently wasted their strength, and scattered their battalions, in the eagerness of pursuit. Bonaparte instantly perceived the advantages which this eagerness gave him. Dessaix at the head of his legion, impetuously rushed forwards among the victorious battalions, whom he charged with the bayonet. The remainder of the division followed his example, and the whole army, catching the enthusiasm, advanced to the charge. The Austrians, astonished at this sudden explosion, withdrew their artillery, and the infantry began to give way. At this moment Dessaix fell. The loss of whom, instead of disconcerting, only heightened the ardour of the troops into a fury to avenge his death. The bayonet, which had driven back the first line of the Austrians, could not pierce the second. The resistance of the Austrians checked for a moment the French in their career, and the event of the day was still doubtful; but its fate was at length determined by general Kellerman, who, ordering a charge of cavalry, threw the Austrians into disorder, and made six thousand men prisoners, among whom were the general Zagg, general St. Julien, and many other officers of rank.

A third line of Austrian infantry remained as a corps de reserve, supported by the rest of the artillery, and the whole of the cavalry. Against this last division, the right wing of the French advanced, with the grenadiers of the consular guard, and supported by the artillery. The Austrian line still maintained its ground; but the French cavalry, under Murat, having charged the Austrian cavalry, the latter gave way, and was completely routed. Night only put an end to the carnage and pursuit.

The French assert, that the Austrians lost in killed, wounded, and prisoners, about fifteen thousand men; the victory was signal on the part of the French, but their own loss was very great. As far as glory belongs to these actions, history will record this battle as honourable to both parties. It would be endless to enumerate the particular traits of heroism which was this day exhibited. On the next, general Melas, finding his situation no longer tenable, proposed an armistice, which was accepted by Bonaparte. The principal conditions of this armistice were the free passage of the Austrians into the territory of Mantua, Tuscany, and Ancona, and the surrender of the whole of Piedmont and Genoa to the French. The armistice, which was concluded for Italy alone, was to continue till an answer could be returned from the court of Vienna.

The general of the imperial army in Germany endeavoured to take advantage of this armistice in Italy, to stop the progress of the troops under Moreau; but the French general had not listened to the proposition; on the contrary, finding himself in possession of the capital, and the principal part of Bavaria, Moreau detached Lecourbe towards the Tyrol, to seize on the Voralberg and the Grisons, and form a junction with the army of Italy. A suspension of arms having again been made, and Count St. Julien having arrived at Paris in July with proposals for peace, supposed to be from the Imperial cabinet, an armistice was at length concluded for the armies in Germany, leaving for the line of demarcation the posts occupied by the respective troops.

During these transactions, intelligence arrived in Europe of the sudden and extraordinary change of affairs in Egypt. The arrival of the troops according to the terms of capitulation between general Kleber, the grand vizier, and sir Sidney Smith, had been daily expected, and the isle of Hieres had been nominated for the performance of quarantine. No doubt had been entertained, but the British cabinet would readily assent to the terms agreed on and signed by the plenipotentiary; and though the instructions which lord Keith (late sir George Elphinstone) had received and transmitted, destroyed or suspended this hope, the grand vizier and the French general continued on good terms, conceiving that the British cabinet would not persevere in its determination. They had even concerted provisionary measures, but a difficulty occurred which hindered the effect of those reciprocal dispositions. The grand vizier, already master of Salahich, Catichobs, Belbois, Damietta, a part of the Delta, and Upper Egypt, evacuated in virtue of the convention, required the French to deliver up to him the citadel of Cairo, of which they were still in possession. Kleber refused to abandon the only fortified place which was left him after Alexandria. His refusal was communicated to the grand vizier, with his resolution to resume hostilities; for which he prepared his army, by communicating the ignominious propositions in the letter from lord Keith.

The French, equally indignant with their general, regardless of the superiority of numbers they had to encounter, and the difficulty of their position, began to cannonade on the 20th of March, at break of day, the Turkish advanced posts at Maturia, two leagues from Cairo. The grand vizier drew out his army, and occupied the ground between that post and the village Elhauca. The French army, consisting of fifteen thousand men, including the cavalry on dromedaries, was ranged in two lines, and extended half a league towards Boulac. The Turkish cavalry, at first made some partial attacks on the French infantry, but without much effect. The Janissaries, opposed to the left wing of the French, advanced next, and attacked with great bravery, but, wanting artillery and ammunition, they were speedily obliged to fall back. Towards noon the French advanced on the whole line with a terrible fire of artillery and musquetry; which threw the Turks into disorder, and instantly the whole army, consisting of forty thousand men, fled in all directions. The grand vizier withdrew to his camp, but was obliged to abandon it the same day, the French having advanced in two oblique lines to cut off his retreat. The route then became general. Nineteen pieces of cannon and a part of the camp fell into the hands of the victors, whose loss was but trivial, as they met with a feeble resistance. The loss of the Turks amounted to eight thousand men killed or wounded, exclusive of those who perished in the desert. At the beginning of the action, Nazon Pacha and Murad Bey passed the rear of the republican army into Cairo, where they massacred whatever French they found, and slaughtered numbers of the Greeks and Copts. Kleber declined any further pursuit of the Turkish army, invested the city of Cairo, which was in revolt against him, and, having taken possession, punished in an exemplary manner the cruelties which had been exercised against those who took part with the French.

The proposals of peace, which in July had been presented in Paris by Count St. Julien, had been the subject of frequent negociations between the French cabinet and the court of Vienna. Whatever might be the hopes or secret views of that court, the refusal of the ratification of the preliminaries was intimated in a note from the British government, which insisted that a minister should be sent to the congress at Luneville, conjointly with the plenipotentiaries of the emperor.

The hostilities of the English in this year, were principally pally connected with the maritime service. A descent on the coast of Bretagne was resolved on, the forts of Quiberon were destroyed, and other embarkations were adopted injurious to the French. From the Dutch, the island of Goree was taken, as well as the American island of Curaçoa. Ferrol was threatened by a British armament; but, though the invaders obtained the neighbouring heights by repelling the Spaniards, they were discouraged from attacking the place. Cadiz which had also been menaced, was saved by the same improbability of success, and the danger of being infected with a contagious disease, which was then prevalent in the garrison, and among the inhabitants of the town.

Disturbances arose, about this time in England, occasioned chiefly by the high price of corn. At Birmingham, and many other provincial towns, depredations, and acts of violence were committed. The metropolis was for several days alarmed by clamorous multitudes, but the chief magistrate, by his firmness and judicious conduct, prevented outrages from becoming serious.

To alleviate the pressure of dearth, the king proposed to the parliament, that the most ample encouragement should be given to the importation of every species of grain, and that measures should be taken for the extension and improvement of agriculture. A proclamation, recommending œconomy, was issued by his majesty, exhorting "all masters of families to reduce the consumption of bread by at least one-third of the quantity consumed in former times, and in no case to suffer the same to exceed one quartern loaf for each person in each week; to abstain from the use of flour in pastry; and restrict the consumption of oats and other grain for the subsistence of horses." Three bills were instantly prepared, prohibiting the use of grain in the distilleries, and the exportation of provisions of any denomination.

A dispatch from sir Hyde Parker, received at the Admiralty-office on the 27th of January, 1800, announced that captain Hamilton of the Surprize, formed a resolution of attempting to cut out, by the boats of his majesty's ship under his command, the Hermoine from the harbour of Porto Cavallo, which had formerly belonged to his majesty; nor was he induced to abandon his project, though two hundred pieces of cannon were mounted on the batteries. He turned the hands up, to acquaint the officers and ship's company of his intentions to lead them to the attack, which was handsomely returned with three cheers, and that they would all follow to a man: the boats, containing one hundred men, including officers, at half past twelve in the morning of the 25th (after having beat the launch of the ship, which carried a twenty-four pounder and twenty men, and receiving several guns and small arms from the frigate) boarded: the forecastle was taken possession of without much resistance; the quarter-deck disputed the point a quarter of an hour, where a dreadful carnage took place; the main-deck held out much longer, and with equal slaughter; they last of all retreated between decks, and continued firing till their ammunition was expended: then, and not till then, did they cry for quarter. At two o'clock they were completely in possession of the Hermione. She was nearly ready for sea, mounting forty-four guns, with a ship's company of three hundred and twenty-one officers and sailors, and fifty-six soldiers. Every officer and man behaved with an uncommon degree of valour and exertion.

The French and Imperial armies were now preparing to open the campaign a second time. The situation of affairs roused the imperial court to a seeming temporary effort of personal courage. The emperor signified his resolution of putting himself, with his brother the archduke John, at the head of the army; hoping that this example, together with the general danger, would encourage the Germans, and other subjects of the empire to join themselves to his imperial majesty, to secure a peace upon honourable terms.

In conformity with the rescript of the imperial minister to the diet, the emperor, and his brother the archduke John, repaired to the army, where the latter entered on his office as commander-in-chief. On his arrival in this character, he received a letter from general Moreau, which had just been transmitted from Paris, and which he thus literally transcribed: "Inform the general who commands the Austrian army, that the emperor refuses to ratify the preliminaries of peace, and that you are obliged to recommence hostilities. You may, however, agree to an armistice of a month, on condition that places of surety be immediately put into your possession." General Moreau at the same time sent an officer to state the terms of this new armistice, or notify the commencement of hostilities the following day. A nearer review of the state of his forces, and the peremptory demand of general Moreau, induced the emperor to adopt more pacific sentiments; in consequence of which, the interview between the archduke John and the French general, Lahorne, ended in an arrangement for another armistice, which included the armies of Italy also, and was to terminate in forty-five days, if no definitive arrangements took place in the mean time. The treaty was signed at Hohenlinden on the 20th of September.

During these proceedings in Germany, a negociation for peace was opened at London. In the beginning of August, M. Thugut, the emperor's prime-minister, had addressed a note to M. Talleyrand, in which he transmitted by order of his imperial majesty, an invitation to the First Consul to nominate plenipotentiaries to treat on this subject; declaring at the same time that his Britannic majesty was disposed to concur in this negociation, as had been announced in a note of lord Minto's, the English minister at Vienna. Lord Minto had therein declared that his Britannic majesty was ready to send his plenipotentiaries to treat of peace, in concert with the emperor, as soon as the French government should have signified its intention of entering into negociation with the cabinet of St. James's. The French government immediately dispatched M. Otto, commissary for the exchange of prisoners in England, a copy of the propositions made by the cabinet of Vienna, with instructions to enter into a negociation with the English cabinet.

M. Otto communicated his instructions to lord Grenville, the most important of which was, that he was authorised to propose and conclude a general armistice between the armies and fleets of the states implicated in the treaty. The commissioners met on the 28th of August, but the result of this negociation was unfavourable to peace. The French insisted on a naval armistice, and demanded great preliminary advantages, declaring they would not consent to a general treaty, unless these requisitions should be complied with. The spirit of the British court revolted from this proposal, and the conference and correspondence ended of course. The rupture of this negociation was followed by that of the continental armistice, which had not afforded time to the belligerent powers to recruit their shattered forces, in order to renew hostilities.

In November, the winter campaign opened, when the Austrians at first gained some advantages, but were at length overcome by the skill and prowess of general Moreau. Prompted by some inconsiderable successes, the Imperialists were induced to abandon their strong positions on the river Inn, where they might have made a long resistance. Leaving this advantageous position, they marched upon the army of the French, stationed near the village of Hohenlinden. Moreau, who had waited for them in the positions he had taken, met the attack as if he had intended only to keep himself on the defensive, and this hesitation in the French general was construed by the Austrians into a disinclination to come to a decisive action; but this error was not of long duration. While the Austrians, confident of victory, were endeavouring to force Moreau to some determinate purpose, they were astonished to find a French division in their rear, led on by Richepanse and Decaer. This moment of hesitation in the Austrian army was the signal for attack: the French generals Grenier and Ney poured down their divisions on the Austrian lines, and met those of Richepanse and Decaer. These last divisions having innumerable obstacles to encounter, had performed prodigies of valour.

Richepanse, cut off from the rest of his division, without looking behind him, had marched with five or six battalions into the midst of the Austrians. The imperial army, surprized, broken, and overwhelmed, endeavoured to retreat; but, ingulphed in defiles and woods, and surrounded by enemies, no mode of escaping or rallying presented itself, and for the space of a league and a half the carnage was tremendous. The centre of the Austrian army had fled or perished. The defeat of the centre consequently drew on that of the wings. The French remained masters of the field, with eighty pieces of cannon, two hundred caissons, ten thousand prisoners, and a considerable number of officers, among whom were three generals of distinction.

The campaign was now decided in favour of the French, and the battle of Hohenlinden, and the passage of the Inn, had thrown not only the court of Vienna, but also the capital, pital, into the greatest confusion, and, in proportion to the presumption of the former, was now its terror and dread of seeing the French soon at the gates. One resource yet remained, since that of arms had proved ineffectual; and of that the imperial court was sufficiently prudent at this crisis to have recourse to.

Prince Charles, who quitted the command of the army at the opening of the campaign, and who retreated into honourable exile, as governor of Bohemia, for declaring his opinion respecting the events of the war, which the result had justified, was again resorted to as the saviour of his country. The court had flattered itself that his presence and efforts would once more establish an equilibrium of force with the French, and conceived hopes that its military affairs were yet retrievable.—This charm was now dissolved: the prince, though adored by the army, perceived that this allurement was departed; and the soldier of every rank hailed his return, not as the hero who was to lead them to victory, but as the herald who was to conduct them to peace. The archduke, whatever hopes he might entertain at the moment of his recal, saw, on his arrival at the army, that they were destitute of foundation. Before, however, he resolved on making a submission, which, from various circumstances, he presumed must be almost unconditional, he resolved on making a last attempt. This attempt was unsuccessful; the Austrians were defeated, and, after losing about eight thousand men, withdrew in disorder behind the Ens. This event convinced the imperial cabinet of the truth of the archduke's repeated assertions, in his correspondence, from the time of his recal, that there was no safety for the Austrian monarchy, but in peace, at any rate; since, in the space of twenty days, the army had lost seventy leagues of ground, twenty-five thousand prisoners, fifteen thousand killed or wounded, one hundred and forty pieces of cannon, and immense magazines of all descriptions, while the enemy was in a position to dictate orders to the capital. An armistice was therefore offered, on the 27th of December, and accepted by Moreau, on condition that peace should, without delay, follow this third cessation of hostilities. A convention was soon after agreed on for the same purpose in Italy between the generals Bellegarde and Brune, in which the Austrians ceded to the French the fortified places they had left behind them untaken, including Mantua which was given up by the subsequent treaty of Luneville (g).

The negociations at Luneville were now carried on with considerable alacrity. The French army, by the convention of the late armistice, possessing part of the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria, within thirty leagues of the capital, and masters of the whole of Italy, gave the republic a decided preponderance with respect to the conditions of peace, which were rather dictated than discussed. By this treaty, the emperor formally ratified the cession of the Belgic provinces, renounced by the treaty of Campo Formio. The whole of the country, left of the Rhine, forming the four new departments, and which had been hitherto previously governed by the French, the cession of which had been stipulated for, and assented to, at the congress of Rastadt, was given up; henceforth the Rhine, from Switzerland to Holland, should consequently form the limits of the German empire and the French republic. In Italy, the possession of the Imperial fiefs was confirmed to the Ligurian republic, and the Cisalpine, which terminated at the river Mirren, was enlarged to the banks of the Adige, including Verona. In consequence of these and other cessions, the emperor was permitted to remain in possession of Istria, Dalmatia, the Venetian islands in the Adriatic depending on those countries, and of the state of Venice, as far as Adige. Such were the principal articles of this treaty, which was declared to be made in common with the Swiss, Dutch, Cisalpine, and Ligurian republics. It was signed at Luneville, by count Dobentzel on the part of the emperor, and Joseph Bonaparte on the part of the French republic, and was to be ratified in thirty days (h).

The year 1801 was introduced by a circumstance which ultimately (g) About this time, Bonaparte, deserting the accustomed form of diplomatic proceeding, addressed a letter to the king of Great Britain, which was inclosed in one from Talleyrand to lord Grenville. He asked, whether the war was to be eternal? Whether the two powerful nations of France and Great Britain could not come to a mutual understanding? And expected this overture to be considered as a proof of his desire to contribute efficaciously for the second time, to a general pacification. Lord Grenville answered Talleyrand, by observing, that the king, seeing no reason for departing from the forms of transacting affairs between foreign states, which prevailed throughout Europe, had directed him to answer the propositions of the first consul, by a note to his minister. He traced the conduct of France from the origin of the existing hostilities, and noticed the repeated assurances made by every succeeding government of pacific intentions, while all their acts were replete with war. The new government had given no proofs of a disposition to adopt a different system, nor could any assurance be given of its stability. The best assurance which Great Britain could receive of the formation of a regular government in France, would be the restoration of that race of princes, who, for so many ages, preserved the French nation in internal prosperity, and in consideration and respect among foreign powers. But, though such an event would obviate every obstacle, his majesty did not consider it indispensable to the attainment of a safe and durable peace; but whenever he should be of opinion that the security of his own dominions, and those of his allies, and the general security of Europe, could be attained, he would eagerly seize the opportunity to concert with his allies, the means of an immediate and general pacification. Hitherto no such security existed; and nothing remained for him but to prosecute, in conjunction with the other powers, a just and defensive war.

At the close of this year, a plan was said to be formed for the assassination of the first consul, whose conduct had procured him many enemies. It was proposed to be carried into execution by means of gunpowder, and the construction of what has since been termed the infernal machine. This machine was nothing more than a barrel filled with gunpowder, in which was to be inserted a match, to produce the explosion at a calculated moment. This barrel was conveyed in a cart, into the Rue Nicaise, in the evening of the 24th of December, when it was known the chief consul intended to be at the opera. The Rue Nicaise being a narrow street, leading from the Thuilleries to the opera, it was supposed he would pass through it at a certain time after he had ascended his carriage; but, lest the velocity of his horses and the burning of the match should not keep in unison, the cart with the machine was so placed as to impede the passage. The coachman not only drove unusually fast, but had the address, in driving through the street, to pass the cart which was intended to obstruct the way. The consul and his suite had proceeded to another street before the explosion took place, which failing in the purpose for which it was designed, was destructive to those who were in its neighbourhood, killing some, wounding others, and shattering the buildings to their foundations. This attempt was at first attributed to the royalist party, but it was soon agreed that none were capable of conceiving or executing such a project, but the Jacobins. An exemplary punishment was therefore declared necessary, and those who first suffered for this act, were two individuals, in whose possession were found a barrel of powder, and some combustible machinery; and some of these not being able to give a satisfactory account, they were sentenced to be shot, and afterwards suffered that punishment. The further researches of the prefect of the police, warranted a conclusion, that it was certainly a Jacobin conspiracy, in consequence of which one hundred and thirty-two were arrested; and, though there was not any specific charge against these individuals, and it was impossible to convict them by a regular trial, an act of police banished them beyond the seas.

(h) At the court of St. James's, the first of January, 1801, present the king's most excellent majesty in council, his majesty was pleased to appoint by proclamation, that the royal style and titles shall henceforth be accepted, taken, and used, in manner and form following: that is to say, the same shall be expressed in the Latin tongue, by these words: Georgius Tertius, Dei Gratia, Britanniarum Rex, Fidei Defensor; and in the English tongue by these words.—George the Third, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith. And that the arms or ensigns armorial of the said united kingdom, shall be quarterly, first and fourth England; second Scotland; third Ireland. And it is our will and pleasure, that there shall be borne therewith, on an escutcheon of pretence, the arms of our dominions in Germany, ensigned with the electoral bonnet. And it is our will and pleasure, that the standard of the said united kingdom, shall be the same quarterings as are herein-before declared to be the arms or ensigns armorial of the said united kingdom, with the escutcheon of pretence thereon, herein-before described; and that the union flag shall be azure, the crosses-saltire of St. Andrew and St. Patrick quarterly, per saltire counter-changed, argent and gules; the latter fimbriated of the second, surmounted by the cross of St. George of the third fimbriated as the saltire.

On the third of February, his majesty's council took the oaths, as privy counsellors for the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland: and his majesty received the great seal from the lord chancellor, and causing it to be defaced, presented to him a new great seal for the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

It is also required, by his majesty's royal proclamation, that the following alterations be made in the book of Common Prayer.—In the title page, instead of the Church of England, insert, " of the United Church of England and Ireland."

In the prayer for the high court of parliament instead of our sovereign and his kingdoms, read, " his dominions."

In the first prayer to be used at sea, instead of his kingdoms, read, " his dominions."

In the form and manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating bishops, priests, and deacons, instead of the church of England, read, " of the united church of England and Ireland."

In the preface of the said form, in two places, instead of church of England, read, " in the united church of England and Ireland."

In the occasional offices, twenty-fifth of October, the king's accession, instead of these realms, read, " this realm."

In the collect, before the epistle, instead of these kingdoms, read, " this united kingdom."

For the preachers, instead of king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, say, " king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

And no edition of the book of Common Prayer, shall be hereafter printed without these amendments; and until copies of such edition may be ultimately produced other interesting events. An administration, which had existed upwards of seventeen years, and had baffled, and at length subdued, a most formidable opposition, was suddenly dissolved; and on the 11th of January, Mr. Pitt gave in his resignation to his majesty, which was immediately followed by that of lord Grenville, earl Spencer, the lord chancellor, Mr. Dundas, and Mr. Windham. Mr. Pitt declared, that he thought himself bound by his duty, his conscience, and his honour, to resign that situation, in which he had not full liberty to pursue his ideas of equity and public benefit. The ostensible ground of resignation was the question of catholic emancipation, as it has been termed. In his ardour for accomplishing the projected union, Mr. Pitt, it is said, had engaged to the Irish catholics to atchieve for them their object, if the act of union should meet with no opposition on their parts; and he took one of the earliest opportunities of bringing it forward in the cabinet council. The English clergy dreaded the increase of popery; and the Irish protestants were alarmed at the idea of having to encounter a Popish judge upon the bench, supported by a Popish jury, summoned by a Popish sheriff. Through what channel his majesty was influenced to oppose this measure, we are ignorant: but it is generally understood that, through his interference, the plan of the minister was defeated: and this was immediately followed by his resignation, and that of most of his colleagues in office.

Of the character of this administration, an impartial judgement will be formed by posterity. The retainers of a minister may erect statues, and pour out the grateful incense of adulation before that idol which has been the tutelar deity of their fortune; but it is the page of history, which alone will erect a durable monument, and which will consecrate the name of a minister to honour and immortality. To Mr. Pitt's administration, the impartial historian cannot accord the praise of political consistency, of extended views, of liberal principles, and an enlarged and beneficial system of policy. He entered upon his political career too early in life, and with a degree of popularity which was calculated to intoxicate an inexperienced mind. Early involved in the vortex of public business, his talents wanted the exercise of study to improve and mature them. He was deficient in some of the rudiments requisite for the knowledge of a statesman. Thus thrown prematurely into public life, gifted by nature with extraordinary talents, among the first of which we may mention a fluent, copious, and impressive eloquence; he was nevertheless an unfinished politician. He would have excelled as an associate, though he was perhaps unequal to the situation of a principal: he was calculated for an admirable partizan, though he wanted the knowledge and capacity of a general. His measures therefore displayed the impetuosity, but not the vigour of youth; they had all the stratagem, but not the judgement of the experienced statesman. They were calculated to excite admiration, rather than to ensure approbation; and, while we were astonished at the boldness of the design, we sometimes beheld, with disappointment, a poverty of execution. He entered upon undertakings of the greatest magnitude, without sufficient information, and he abandoned them, because he had not calculated upon the difficulties that were to be encountered. In every thing, his object was to be distinguished; in every thing he must be a prominent character. Thus the statesman was lost in the projector; and in too eagerly pursuing fame, he lost that greatness, to which, with more sober counsels, he might have attained.

But the errors of Mr. Pitt were rather errors of judgement than of principle. We despise the factious calummy which would ascribe to him a deliberate plan to overthrow the liberties of his country. He disapproved of liberty only when it opposed his views; and he sported occasionally with the constitution of his country, only to serve the little purposes of party—the exigencies of the moment. He lavished the honours of the peerage with an unsparing hand; though the system of bribery, under the colour of participating in the loan, was laid aside; nor does it appear, on the whole, that the pension list was immoderately enlarged during his administration.

So far from charging this administration with pursuing despotism on a system, it is lamented that they were totally without any plan or system whatever. Mr. Pitt's administration was best characterized by a favourite phrase of his own,—existing circumstances. His first political project was a parliamentary reform, but he discovered that existing circumstances would not admit it. He undertook to extinguish the national debt; he concluded by doubling it. He gloried in being the minister of peace; and soon after manifested an inordinate passion for war. Thus one part of his administration was a contradiction of another; one system served as a practical refutation of the preceding: a measure of the highest national importance, which had been ordered in the afternoon, has been revoked the succeeding morning.

The same inconsistency is observable in the causes, or rather excuses for the late war. At one time, it was a war voluntarily undertaken for religion, monarchy, and social order; at another, we were forced into it by the aggression of our adversaries. At one period, it was prosecuted to procure indemnity for the past, and security for the future: at another, for the express purpose of restoring the house of Bourbon. In the negociation at Paris, the sine quâ non was the restoration of the Netherlands to the emperor of Germany: in the answer to the overture of Bonaparte, it was the re-establishment of monarchy in France. Contrary to the policy of all sagacious statesmen, who embrace the moment of good fortune to secure the most advantageous terms, our ministers were haughty and insolent in success, and abject in ill fortune; they negociated only when their allies were beaten off the field.

The character of Mr. Pitt's administration has been grossly mistaken by both parties. He was neither the knight errant of despotism, nor the cool and crafty politician. His proceedings were more the effect of impulse than of meditation. He has been extolled as a profound financier; the fact, however, has rather been asserted than proved. It is generally understood, that, of three plans for the liquidation of the national debt, presented by the late Dr. Price, he made choice of the worst; a circumstance that argues little for either his knowledge or his judgement in that department. His first essay in taxation, which was termed the commutation tax, was a palpable blunder in finance, and answered no beneficial purpose to any part of the nation, except the India company. The other taxes, which he from time to time imposed, evinced no genius for finance. They consisted either in augmentations of existing taxes, or in fantastical forms of taxation which have been found either impolitic or unproductive. Among these may be enumerated the taxes on shops, watches, maid servants, hair-powder, armorial bearings, &c. A great and masterly genius for finance might certainly, in so long a space of time as seventeen years, have projected something of a more novel and interesting a nature.

Such appears to be the impartial outline of the character of this administration. Mr. Pitt is neither to be regarded as the saviour of his country, nor the enemy of its liberties. His administration will be known to posterity chiefly by its profusion; and the mischiefs which the nation has to regret from it are five hundred millions added to the national debt, the existing taxes nearly trebled, and the necessaries of life (from these causes, and the unnecessary extension of paper credit) raised to such an exorbitant price as to be beyond the power of many individuals to purchase them, who before this period could have lived on their earnings.

A considerable time elapsed before the new ministerial arrangements were announced. When the new ministry was formed, lord Eldon was nominated to the office of lord high chancellor; lord St. Vincent to that of the first lord of the admiralty; lord Hawkesbury to that of secretary of state for the foreign department; lord Pelham to that of secretary of state for the home department; and colonel Yorke to that of secretary at war. Lord Eldon was succeeded by sir Richard Pepper Arden, now created lord Alvanley, as chief justice of the common pleas; and Mr. Addington (i), by sir John Mitford, as speaker of the house of commons, though that gentleman strongly intimated, that he did not consider this dignity as the ne plus ultra of his ambition, but merely as an avenue to other dignities and emoluments: sir William Grant was appointed master had, parsons, vicars, &c. are required, (to prevent mistakes) with pen, to correct and amend all such prayers in their church books, according to the above directions: and the bishops are enjoined to take care, that obedience be paid to the same accordingly, within their respective dioceses.

(i) After some deliberation, his majesty selected Mr. Addington for the office of first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. This gentleman had long been intimately acquainted with Mr. Pitt, whose influence had raised him to the chair of the house of commons.

of

of the rolls, and Mr. Law and Mr. Perceval, attorney and solicitor-generals. But before the new ministers could regularly enter upon their respective offices, and before their appointment was announced in the Gazette, his majesty was seized with a febrile indisposition, and continued so far indisposed, as to be unable to transact public business, till the middle of the month of March. Till that period, the old ministers continued to hold the reins of government, with the exception only of lord St. Vincent and lord Hawkesbury, who had been inducted into office previous to his majesty's indisposition.

A vacancy having happened in the representation of the borough of Old Sarum, John Horne Tooke, esquire, was named its representative by the proprietor, lord Camelford (k). When Mr. Tooke had taken the oaths at the table, lord Temple gave notice that he should move for his expulsion. The matter was, however, deferred till the 6th of May, and during the interval, a commitee had been appointed to search for precedents, and report on the case. On that day, lord Temple brought forward his motion, and supported it with considerable ability. Mr. Tooke adduced many cogent arguments, to establish his right to a seat; and, after ridiculing the officious zeal of lord Temple, and his parade of historic learning, he expressed a willingness to co-operate with him in a general bill for the exclusion of the clergy, if it should afford him a prospect of the increase of moral and religious wisdom; but he was inimical to the practice of punishing an individual by an ex post facto law. Though Mr. Tooke maintained that nothing but positive assertion, unsupported by ecclesiastical law, church history, or parliamentary precedent, had proceeded from its advocates, it passed through both houses. He was supported by Mr. Erskine, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Grey; and opposed by sir William Scott, and the attorney and solicitor-generals. The motion was carried by a majority of forty-one (l).

A bill was now introduced, declaring the clergy ineligible to a seat in the house of commons; but not any debate of importance took place, till the second reading in the house of lords, on the 15th of June, when lord Thurlow cited various legal authorities decidedly against the bill; and he was followed, in similar arguments, by the lords Moira, Carlisle, and Holland. The bill was strenuously supported by the lord chancellor, the bishop of Rochester, and other noble lords; and being read a second time, was afterwards passed into a law. But it may not be improper to observe, that, by a specific clause, it was prevented from expelling Mr. Tooke from the existing parliament.

The suspension of the habeas corpus act was moved and carried in both houses, according to an annual custom, for several years; as was the bill for the continuance of martial law in Ireland. This measure was followed by the introduction of a bill of indemnity in favour of the late administration, which, after some debate, passed both houses.

On the 2nd of July, the session was closed by commission, his majesty being then absent at Weymouth. The lord chancellor addressed the two houses in an appropriate speech, expiating on the late victories; and adding, that they derived peculiar value in his majesty's estimation, from their tendency to facilitate the restoration of peace. This inspired a public confidence that peace would be a desirable object of the new administration, in which the people of this country were not disappointed; that object was obtained, though, unfortunately, it was but of short duration.

Notwithstanding the chancellor's address to the imperial parliament, peace with France, at this time, appeared more impracticable than at any former period of the war. The disgust excited by the rejection of Bonaparte's overture, on his assuming the government of France, was heightened by the breach of a treaty concluded by sir Sydney Smith, and by an order issued for seizing the fishing boats off the French coasts: Besides, France was now powerfully strengthened by the alliance of Russia; and a formidable confederacy of the maritime powers of the north, threatened the annihilation of the naval empire of the united kingdom.

To prevent the active co-operation of Denmark in the designs of Russia, a considerable armament was fitted out in the British ports, under the command of sir Hyde Parker and lord Nelson. When this fleet approached Copenhagen, about the middle of March, the Danes appeared to have made very formidable dispositions.

The defensive arrangements of the Danes were well calculated to inspire terror. The approaches to Copenhagen were skilfully and judiciously fortified; batteries of cannon and mortars were erected on the shore wherever they could be rendered efficacious. Amatz, and the Crown Islands, were strengthened and improved by a variety of works: a chain, and fort built on piles protected the mouth of the harbour; and a line of shipping was an additional buttress to its support. The admiral having ordered an attack from the southward, lord Nelson advanced with twelve ships of the line, and four frigates, attended by some sloops, fire-ships, and bomb-vessels; but two of the large ships run aground, from the intricacy of the navigation, and another was obliged to cast anchor at a considerable distance from her intended station. Captain Murray, in the Edgar, gallantly led the van. The Monarch sustained the most destructive fire, Mosse, the commander, being killed, and about fifty of his men. Captain Riou was also killed; the battle raging for three hours, with great slaughter on both sides. Of the English, upwards of two hundred and fifty were killed, and of the Danes, about five hundred. The wounded on each side were more numerous. Some of our ships were much damaged; and seventeen Danish vessels, including floating batteries, were sunk, captured, or destroyed.

After the termination of the contest, lord Nelson threatened to burn the floating batteries, without sparing even the prisoners on board, if the enemy did not instantly cease firing. This menace produced a cessation of hostilities, and an armistice was soon after concluded with the Danish court.

About the middle of April, the British fleet appeared off the entrance of Carlscrona, a port in Sweden; and the admiral informed the governor, that the court of Denmark, having concluded an armistice, by which the unfortunate dispute with the court of St. James's had been accommodated, he was directed to require an explicit answer from his Swedish majesty, relative to his intention of adhering to, or abandoning, the hostile measures he had taken in conjunction with Russia. An official answer to this demand was communicated from the king of Sweden to sir Hyde Parker, intimating, that his Swedish majesty would not fail to perform the engagements entered into with his allies; but that he would not refuse to hearken to equitable proposals, made by deputies properly authorized to regulate

(k) This eccentric yonng nobleman, after performing a principal character in many tumults and commotions, for some of which he had suffered temporary imprisonment, provoked captain Best of the navy to give him a challenge, a duel ensued, and the irascible peer, experienced that death he had frequently sought! A bullet from the pistol of his adversary, terminated his existence on the 8th of March, 1804.—The following annecdote of this young nobleman may perhaps be found interesting. On the 30th of January, 1798, died, at English harbour, Antigua Charles Paterson, esquire, first lieutenant of his majesty's ship Perdrix. This event was occasioned by a dispute between the deceased and lord Camelford, upon the right of commanding at English Harbour. Lord Camelford commanded his majesty's sloop of war the Favourite, by virtue of an order or warrant from admiral Hervey; and Mr. Paterson, (though an older lieutenant than lord Camelford) had lately served on board that ship under his command; but, having been removed to the Perdrix, and lord Camelford not having a commission as master and commander, Mr. Paterson being then at English Harbour, supposed himself to be the commanding officer, and under that idea, issued some orders to lord Camelford, which were answered by other orders from lord Camelford to Mr. Paterson. Upon Mr. Paterson's refusal to obey these orders, a lieutenant and a party of marines were sent to put him under arrest, when Mr. Paterson prepared for resistance, and ordered the crew of the Perdrix to arm in his defence. But before any conflict took place, lord Camelford arrived, went up to Mr. Paterson, demanded if he would obey his orders or not; and, upon being answered in the negative, he immediately shot him dead upon the spot. A court martial was some time afterwards held on board the Invincible, in Fort Royal Bay, Martinique, when the court, being duly sworn, proceeded to try lord Camelford; and they were unanimously of opinion, that, "the very extraordinary and manifest disobedience of lieutenant Paterson, both before and at the instant of his death, to the orders of lord Camelford, the senior officer at English Harbour, at that time, and the violent measures taken by lieutenant Paterson to resist the same, by arming the Perdrix's ship's company, were acts of mutiny highly injurious to the discipline of his majesty's service. The court do therefore unanimously adjudge, that the right honourable lord Camelford be honourably acquitted."

(l) The case of the famous Dr. Walker was well known, who bravely defended Londonderry, during its siege by James the Second. King William was anxious to reward him with a bishopric: the bishops interfered, and gave it as their opinion, that notwithstanding he had performed great services, his hands had been embrued in blood, and he could not therefore be made a bishop. King William remunerated him another way, and gave him a regiment; and the doctor, then created colonel Walker, was afterwards killed, fighting gallantly by his side.

F. P. Burney delin.

J. Taylor fec.

The Death of General Abercrombie at the battle of Alexandria, March 21. 1801.

Published as the Act directs, Sept. 10. 1813. by J. Stratford. N.° 112 Holborn Hill.

regulate the matters in dispute. The termination of this contest is not to be attributed either to the battle of Copenhagen, or to the victorious progress of the British fleet; but to an event which had just before taken place, which produced an almost instantaneous revolution in the politics of the north—the death of the emperor Paul, who had acted so versatile a part on the political stage, from the period when he ascended the Russian throne. Respecting the cause and manner of his death, a cautious silence was maintained in Russia (m). Of his character, but little is to be said. He was a strange compound of inconsistencies: from the consideration of the most important enterprizes, he would descend to the most trivial narratives. He was capricious in the extreme, and equally credulous and suspicious. His conduct was marked by an eccentricity, which not unjustly induced a suspicion of mental derangement. His benignity to Kosciusko, and the Polish insurgents, formed an extraordinary contrast to his embarking in the coalition against France, which was succeeded by another wonderful change, in his desertion of the coalesced powers, his alliance with Bonaparte, and his quarrel with England. The same eccentricity which signalized his character in his foreign transactions, distinguished his domestic policy, and many of his acts can only be characterized as the capricious outrages of a tyrant. His mortal career was too soon terminated to admit of a clear developement of his character; but it may confidently be predicted, that he would not have lived either to his own honour, or the benefit of his own country. His want of steadiness and principle deprived him of respect; and his arbitrary proceedings excited general disgust and odium. His death was unlamented, and his son Alexander ascended the throne, amidst the unbounded acclamations of the people.

The conduct of Alexander, his eldest son, who succeeded him, was, on his accession to power, characterized at least by an apparent moderation, which formed a contrast to the hasty violence of his predecessor. The new emperor disclaimed the politics of his father. Soon after a cessation of arms, and the general outline of a pacific accommodation, were agreed on between the Russian court and sir Hyde Parker; and lord St. Helens was dispatched from our court, with ample powers to terminate the dispute. In the mean time, the embargo on the British ships detained in the ports of Russia was removed; and this honourable conduct was answered by a correspondent liberality on the part of Great Britain. Under these favourable auspices the negociation commenced, and, it was natural to conclude that each party would be disposed to concede a little, which actually took place. One stipulation in the treaty deserves particular commendation, that of the confining the right of search to the ships employed entirely in the service of government. Thus, by the dissolution of this confederacy, one of the great obstacles to a peace between Great Britain and the French government was happily set aside.

The vigilance of ministers having, about this time, obtained certain information of the renewal of seditious practices, which had been checked by coërcive laws, the Habeas Corpus act was again suspended, and a bill reenacted to prevent treasonable and seditious meetings. Martial law was also continued in Ireland, by statute, as the union had not perfectly tranquillized that country.

By reason of the breach of the treaty between general Kleber and sir Sidney Smith, a considerable force had been dispatched from Great Britain, under admiral lord Keith and general Abercrombie, which, after unexpected delays, arrived off Alexandria on the first of March. The day following, the fleet made sail for the bay of Aboukir, and anchored there. Till the 7th, the sea ran so high, that the disembarkation could not be effected; but on that day the first division accomplished their landing, in the face of a body of French, who were aware of their intention, and were posted in force, with considerable advantages of position. The front of the disembarkation was narrow, and a hill, which commanded the whole, appeared almost inaccessible; yet the British troops ascended it, under the fire of grape-shot, with the utmost intrepidity, and forced the French to retire, leaving behind them several pieces of artillery, and a number of horses, though upwards of seven hundred of our men, sailors included, were killed or wounded in this service. The troops which landed on the 8th of March, advanced three miles the same day; and on the 12th, the whole army moved forward, and came within sight of the French, who were formed advantageously on a ridge, with their left to the canal of Alexandria, and their right towards the sea.

It having been resolved to commence the attack on the 13th, the British army marched in two lines by the left, with an intention of turning the right flank of the enemy. The attack was anticipated by the French; who descended from the heights on which they had formed, and attacked the leading brigades of both lines. The British troops were therefore obliged to change their position, and the rest of the army immediately followed their example. The British advanced guard suffered considerably, but after a severe conflict, victory declared in favour of the English. The loss of the French must of course have been also considerable. Sir Ralph Abercrombie took with him from England, upwards of fifteen thousand infantry and cavalry, and with the seamen, who, from the official returns appear to have been engaged, the troops must have amounted to that number at the least. One hundred and fifty of the English and their associates were killed, and about one thousand one hundred wounded.

The British army pursued their successes with vigour: and on the 21st of the same month, a more memorable conflict occurred, with a similar event, at the distance of about four miles from Alexandria. It commenced before day light in the morning, by a false attack on the left of the English, under major-general Craddock, in which the French were repulsed. But the most vigorous efforts of the enemy were directed to the right of the English army, which they endeavoured to turn. The attack, on that point, was gallantly begun by the French infantry, sustained by a strong body of cavalry, who charged in column. The contest was remarkably obstinate. The French were twice repulsed, and their cavalry were repeatedly mixed with the British infantry; but at length gave way. While this was passing on the right, the French attempted to penetrate the centre of the British army, with a column of infantry, who were also repulsed, and obliged to retreat. A corps of light troops, however, advanced, supported by infantry and cavalry, to check the left of the English, which was the weakest of the whole line; but all their efforts were ineffectual, and the British forces remained masters of the field. The loss on our side, in killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to upwards of fifteen hundred; that of the French was estimated at double that number.

Sir Ralph Abercrombie was vigorously engaged in the heat of action on the right, when he received a mortal wound in the thigh, though he continued in the field till the battle ceased to rage. In this action, major-general Moore, and sir Sidney Smith, were also wounded. The French general Roize was left dead on the field, and generals Lanusse and Rodet afterwards died of their wounds. These actions were decisive of the fate of Egypt.

After the death of sir Ralph Abercrombie, general Hutchinson assumed the chief command of the British forces, and proceeded towards Alexandria, where the principal force of the enemy was yet concentered. In the mean time, the town and castle of Rosetta was taken by a division of the British army, under colonel Spencer, aided by a body of Turks. The French garrison, consisting of about eight hundred men, made but a feeble resistance, and retired to the right bank of the Nile, leaving a few men killed and taken prisoners.

During these transactions in the vicinity of Alexandria, admiral Blanket, with a considerable force from the East Indies, landed at Suez. The admiral was separated from the rest of his squadron in the dangerous and difficult passage of the Red Sea; but, before the conclusion of April, was joined by large reinforcements, commanded by general Baird, colonels Wellesley, Murray, and others.

Cairo being a principal object with the allies, a force was detached for its reduction. On the 9th of May, general Hutchinson, with four thousand British, and an equal number of Turks, attacked the French near Rahmanieh, which, on the following day, surrendered to the victors. The French were driven in, and in the night retreated towards Cairo, leaving a small garrison at Rahmanieh, which likewise surrendered to the allies. About the same time, a body of the French and Copts, who had moved forward from Cairo to attack the Turks, were defeated by the grand vizier, assisted by colonel Murray, and other British officers.

About the middle of June, the British army, under general Hutchinson, reached the vicinity of Cairo. He found the works very much extended, though the garrison did not consist of more than four or five thousand men. The captain pacha, at the same time, invested Gizeh, a kind of suburb on the left canal of the Nile, and the grand vizier took a position within cannon-shot of the city. Thus invested on every side, Beillard, the French commandant, sent a flag of truce to the English general, offering to treat for the evacuation of Cairo, upon certain conditions. The terms adjusted were not dishonourable to the enemy. It was agreed that all the French forces should evacuate the city of Cairo, the citadel, the town and forts of Boulas, and all the other parts of Egypt, except Alexandria: that they should proceed by land to Rosetta, with their arms, baggage, artillery, and ammunition, and should afterwards be conveyed, at the expence of the allied powers, to some of the southern ports of France; that every person attached to the French army should have the same indulgencies as the soldiery; and that, immediately after the ratification, the prisoners on both sides should be set at liberty.

(m) Authentic accounts inform us, that he was strangled in his own palace, on the 24th of March, by order of count Zouboff

Alexandria, however, was yet to be reduced. With the assistance of lord Keith, general Hutchinson directed the siege. Some heights in front of the entrenched position of the enemy were secured; the fort of Marabout was successfully attacked both by sea and land; and major-general Coote defeated a strong corps on the western side of the town. The French suffered extremely in the action, and retreated in much confusion, leaving their wounded, and seven pieces of cannon behind them. Other acts of vigorous hostility subdued the firmness of general Menou, who yielded the place upon honourable terms.

When the negociation was nearly completed between the hostile governments, the menace of an invasion from France induced the British nation to adopt measures of defence; and lord Nelson was directed to sail towards the French coast to impede or destroy the preparations of the enemy. Arriving off Boulogne, he attempted to demolish the armed vessels in that port, a few of which were sunk or disabled; but a more serious attack was meditated, when he had reinforced his armament. The boats destined for boarding the flotilla were dispatched in the night, in four divisions, and respectively conducted by the captains Somerville, Parker, Cotgrave, and Jones: other boats, containing howitzers, were detached under captain Conn, to assist in the enterprize. Parker's division first approached the enemy, and began the attack with undaunted bravery; but an unforeseen and unexpected obstacle baffled his strenuous exertions: a very strong netting was traced up to the lower yards of the French vessels, which were firmly fastened with chains to each other, as well as to the ground. So irresistible was the foe, thus guarded, that two-thirds of the crew of the boat in which he acted, were repelled in attempting to board a large brig, by a tremendous discharge of cannon and musquetry. Many of the assailants were killed, and many more wounded and mutilated. A shot carried away the leg and part of the thigh of the gallant captain. Somerville silenced the fire of a brig near the pier head; but, instead of bringing her off, he found it a difficult task to secure the retreat of his own boats. Cotgrave, after great exertion, was deprived of the services of many of his men, by the fire from the shore and the flotilla. Jones was so obstructed by the tide, that he could not approach till break of day, when the other captains were returning: he therefore did not attempt any hostile acts. The failure of success in this enterprize was much lamented, while the zeal and courage displayed in it were much admired. Lord Nelson informs us, that one hundred and seventy-two of our men were either killed or wounded. Captain Parker died of his wounds on the 27th of September, after the return of the fleet to the Downs.

The negociations with France which commenced early in the summer, were conducted with equal ability and moderation. The dissolution of the northern confederacy, and the successes in Egypt, had removed the greatest obstacles, and administration embraced the favourable opportunity which these circumstances presented. The island of Malta was to be evacuated by the British troops, and restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem. Egypt was to be restored to the Ottoman Porte. The territory of Portugal was to be maintained in its integrity, and the French were to evacuate the territories of Rome and Naples. The republic of the Seven Islands was to be recognized by France. The fishery at Newfoundland was to be established on its former basis; and, finally, the English and French plenipotentiaries were to be named by the contracting parties, to repair to Amiens, to proceed with the formation of a definitive treaty, in concert with the allies of the contracting parties.

These particulars being announced in England, emotions of joy were excited in the nation from a different cause. A negociation had long taken place between M. Otto and lord Hawkesbury, and when it was generally understood that some important disputes were yet unsettled, which would probably preclude an accommodation without an additional year of hostile exertion, preliminary articles were actually signed.

By these preliminaries, which were executed in London in 1802, by lord Hawkesbury, on the part of his Britannic majesty, and by M. Otto, on the part of the French republic, it was stipulated that the king of Great Britain should restore all the possessions occupied or conquered by his forces during the war, except the island of Trinidad, and the Dutch possessions in Ceylon: that, in the port of the Cape of Good Hope, each of the contracting parties should enjoy the same advantages: that the territories of the Ottoman emperor, including Egypt, should remain entire, as they were before the commencement of the war: that the republic of the Seven United islands should be recognized by the republic of France: that the French troops should evacuate the territories of Rome and Naples: that Malta should be evacuated by the British troops, and be again possessed by the knights of Saint John of Jerusalem: and that the queen of Portugal should not lose any part of her dominions.

When the particulars of these preliminaries were communicated to the parliament, his majesty supposed they would manifest the justice and moderation of his views, and be conducive to the substantial interests of this country: but they were far from being generally approved; though the address for the speech was not opposed in either house.

Mr. Windham censured the terms of the peace. Mr. Sheridan qualified his disapprobation with the following remark:—"It is a peace, of which every man is glad, but of which no man is proud." Earl Spencer said they were inadequate to our just expectations; and lord Temple averred, that a continuation of the war would have been less dangerous than such a peace. But, notwithstanding these and a variety of other censures, an approving address was voted by a majority of one hundred and four peers.

In the lower house, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox voted for it; the latter declaring, "that we could not have insisted on better terms without great risk of a rupture of the negociation." The approvers, however, were more numerous than the censurers; for the house, without a division, agreed to address the king in favour of the preliminaries.

About this time a mutiny arose in Bantry Bay, the crew of the Temeraire having protested against serving in the West Indies; but the vigilance of the officers prevented its extending to a material height: twenty of the offenders were tried by a court-martial at Portsmouth, and eleven suffered capital punishment.

Impartial justice was also evinced in the conviction of lieutenant-colonel Wall, who, when governor of Goree, had occasioned the death of a serjeant, by unwarrantable cruelty. Justice was tardy, on this occasion, for upwards of nineteen years intervened between the surrender and the trial.

Previous to the definitive treaty being adjusted, a great force was thought necessary for the national defence, as, from a tedious and unnecessary delay, the pacific inclinations of Bonaparte began to be doubted. At length, however, the treaty was signed at Amiens by the marquis Cornwallis and Joseph Bonaparte, which differed from the preliminaries in the following points. A part of Portuguese Guiana was yielded to the French by a new regulation of the boundaries. Respecting Malta, it provided that no French or English tongue, or class of knights should be allowed; that half the soldiers in the garrison should be natives, and the rest should be supplied for a time by the king of Naples; that the independence of the island under the sway of the knights, should be guaranteed by France, Great Britain, Austria, Spain, Russia, and Prussia; and its ports should be free to all nations. It was also agreed that the prince of Orange should be compensated for his loss of property and power; and that persons who shall in future be accused of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy, should be surrendered to the demands of each party.

The plenipotentiaries named by the said parties were the following: On the part of the French republic, Joseph Bonaparte: on the part of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the marquis Cornwallis: on that of the king of Spain, don Azara; and, on the part of the Batavian Batavian republic, the baron Schimmelpenninck. After a conference held statedly at Amiens, from the month of October, 1801, to the month of March, 1802, during which the public mind was greatly agitated; the treaty, conformably to the preliminaries, was signed by the respective plenipotentiaries, on the 27th of March; and thus terminated, for a short space, a war which had been attended with an unparalleled profusion of blood and treasure.

A dispatch arrived about this period from port Antonio, sent by lieutenant Johnstone of the Lark, relating a brilliant little exploit performed by the two boats of that vessel. After chasing a Spanish privateer the whole afternoon, close in with the Cuba shore, till dark, she took shelter within the portillo recess. Lieutenant Johnstone then sent lieutenant Pasley and Mr. M'Cloud, midshipman, with the yawl and cutter, and sixteen men in each. About half past ten, Mr. Pasley found her at anchor in the place he expected: she was waiting the attack in readiness, which she commenced by a discharge from one nine and two four pounders, which severely wounded several in each boat. They boarded her, however, and, after a severe contest, they carried her. She proved to be the Esperance, from St. Jago, commanded by Joseph Collit, and had on board, when the action commenced, forty-five men, twenty-one of whom were killed, and six wounded. The captain and all the officers, were among the former.

On the 3rd of March, a great national loss was sustained in the death of the duke of Bedford, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. His grace was in such perfect health on the Friday morning preceding his dissolution, as to have played at tennis during the early part of it. The duke continued sensible to the last moment, and submitted to an operation which was recommended by Dr. Halifax and sir James Earle, though only temporary relief could be expected from it. His grace, however, requested to be indulged with two hours, for some necessary arrangements of his papers. The operation was then performed, and he died as above stated, after an illness of four days, to the great regret of his family and friends, and of many hundreds who were fed by his bounty and encouragement. His favourite pursuit was agriculture, and the encouragement of those useful arts that may be justly called the basement pillars of every well-regulated state; his princely fortune enabled him to carry these pursuits to an extent, that gradually evinced the incalculable powers of art, when called forth in aid of nature. The duke of Bedford's will was short, of which the following is a copy. "I, Francis, duke of Bedford, do give unto my brother John Russell, all my personal property. Dated this twenty-seventh of February, 1802. BEDFORD (n)."

Accidents had frequently happened on the Kentish coast; but a very deplorable one occurred in the early part of March. The hoy named Margate, of Margate, John Goodbyrn, captain, very deeply laden with corn for the London market, having a crew of four men, with twenty-eight passengers, sailed from the harbour in moderate weather, at three on Saturday afternoon, and came to an anchor in the roads, till near nine in the evening, when they again got under sail, and soon after the weather began to be very tempestuous; but they continued working against the wind, and notwithstanding the utmost exertions of the crew, the vessel striking the ground, the rudder was off, and she became totally unmanageable. At length the scene became truly horrible, as a dreadful sea was breaking over the hoy every moment, and women and children were loud and vehement in their lamentations. Five of the passengers, and four of the crew, sought shelter in the shrouds, where they continued till the water was so lowered, that they could get on shore about five in the morning. The scene which the morning presented to numerous spectators from Margate and the neighbouring villages, cannot possibly be described; as within the length of a mile and a half, sixteen men and women lay dead on the shore; and very soon after seven other passengers were taken in the same state from the cabin, making in the whole twenty-three persons.

On the 29th of March, at nine in the morning, arrived Mr. Moore, assistant secretary to marquis Cornwallis, with the definitive treaty of peace; which was signed at Amiens, at four in the afternoon of the 27th instant, by the plenipotentiary of his majesty, and by the plenipotentiaries of France, Spain, and the Batavian republic. And on the 21st of April, the honourable Henry Pierrepoint, dispatched by Andrew Merry, esquire, his majesty's minister plenipotentiary to the French republic, arrived with the ratification by the first consul of the French republic, of the definitive treaty, signed the 27th of March; which was exchanged with Mr. Merry, against that of his majesty, on the 18th of April, at Paris, by the plenipotentiary of the French republic.

On the 22nd of April, his majesty issued a proclamation, declaring the conclusion of the war with the French republic, his Catholic majesty, and the Batavian republic; and, on the same day, another proclamation, appointing and commanding that a general thanksgiving to Almighty God for these his mercies be observed, on Tuesday, the first of June.

A resolution having been formed by Bonaparte for re-establishing the Catholic religion in France, that ceremony was performed on the 18th of April at Paris, with a degree of splendour perhaps unprecedented even in that capital. The street from the Thuilleries to Nôtre Dame, was doubly lined with soldiers; a guard of gendarmerie and grenadier guards preceded the berlin of the chief consul, which was drawn by eight horses: those of the other two consuls, had each six horses; and forty carriages, containing the ambassadors, counsellors of state, and ministers, together with five carriages for the most distinguished generals, were each drawn by four horses. The procession occupied an hour and a half to the church, where the primary authorities, &c. were assembled. A box, decorated with gold and jewels, and raised about ten feet, received the consuls, whilst the pope's legate and the two archbishops sat in another opposite to them. Bonaparte went through all the ceremonies of solemn mass, the soldiers presenting arms at those parts in which the people bow. A box was erected for the foreign ministers, and another for the family of the chief consul, whose mother, sitting to the right of madame Bonaparte, beheld her five sons assisting at the solemnity; which was closed by the Te Deum of Paesiello. Among the consecrations was the sword of Bonaparte, the hilt of which is mounted with the jewels formerly belonging to the crown, the famous Pitt diamond appearing on the top.

M. de Boisgelin, late archbishop of Aix, who preached before the first consul on the 10th, is the same prelate who, when Louis XVI. was crowned at Rheims, delivered a discourse analogous to the solemnity!

On the 29th of April, the ceremony of proclaiming peace took place, with the accustomed solemnity. The populace began to assemble so early as six o'clock in the morning, in every situation that could command the most distant prospect of the cavalcade, and, as the town was never known to be so full, the crowd was immense. The tops of the houses were covered with spectators. The heralds were richly dressed, and their horses gaily caparisoned.

In the court of Common Pleas, the special verdict in the case of lord Nelson v. lord Saint Vincent was argued on the 17th of May. The cause of action was prize-money, proceeding from a capture made by a frigate of the Mediterranean squadron, after lord St. Vincent had quitted the fleet and sailed for England: the fleet was actually under the command of lord Nelson, when the capture was made. On the part of lord Nelson, it was contended, that the instant lord St. Vincent quitted the fleet, the admiral who commanded it was entitled to the admiral's share of prize-money. On the part of lord St. Vincent, it was replied, that there could be but one commander-in-chief of a squadron; and that till lord St. Vincent resigned the command, or was superseded, the responsibility of that situation, and the profits, belonged to him, and were not affected by his returning to England for his health.

Addresses of congratulation to the king on the definitive treaty of peace, were inserted about this time, in the London Gazette, from the cities of Bath, Gloucester, Coventry, Hereford, Wells, Winchester; the counties of Northumberland, Surrey, Norfolk, Somerset, Devon; the towns of Southampton, Beverley, Stirling, Ashburton, Dumfermline, Queens-ferry, Torrington, Banbury, Scarborough, Yarmouth, Callington, Birmingham, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Kingston-on-Thames, Pool, Liverpool, and the Protestant dissenting ministers of London and Westminster.

The king was pleased to grant to the right honourable Horatio, viscount and baron Nelson of the Nile, and of Burnham Thorpe, in the county of Norfolk, knight of the (n) It is remarkable that there has been no regular succession in the illustrious family of Bedford. The earls and dukes have all been brothers, cousins, or grandsons, of their immediate predecessors.

Bath,

Bath, and vice-admiral of the blue (also duke of Bronte in Sicily, and grand cross of the order of St. Ferdinand, and of Merit) his royal licence to receive and wear the insignia of the order of the Crescent, which the grand signior had transmitted to him.

He also granted to major-general sir Eyre Coote, knight of the Bath, his royal license to receive and wear the insignia of the order of the Crescent, which the grand signior had transmitted to him.

The Turkey company also manifested their gratitude to sir Sydney Smith, by presenting him with the freedom of the company, and a magnificent piece of plate, in the form of a vase, highly decorated; the top terminating with the figure of an alligator, and one side bearing an appropriate inscription.

The navy and army estimate were moved on the 9th of June, in the house of commons. Seventy thousand seamen and marines were voted for the remainder of the year: but Mr. Addington observed, "that this was far beyond the peace establishment, which probably would not amount to more than thirty thousand. It was thought unavoidably necessary to continue the present high number, in consequence of so many ships of war being in distant stations abroad. The army estimates voted, however, seem to approach very near to the actual peace establishment, and probably they will no further vary hereafter, than in certain regulations, which cannot now be made. The number of men voted, is, of cavalry, fourteen thousand, comprehending thirty regiments; of infantry, nearly fifty thousand, comprehending seventy regiments, besides the guards, making a total of about seventy thousand men, at an expence of two millions and a half annually. The duke of York to continue commander-in-chief, with three lieutenant and major-generals under him; besides one lieutenant-general for Scotland, and one for Ireland. This establishment of the regulars of the army, is as low as any one expected, but it is not to be regarded as a final arrangement."

To the honour of the united kingdom, the house of commons resolved themselves into a committee of supply, to which the consideration of Dr. Jenner's petition, relative to the vaccine inoculation was preferred. Admiral Berkley, after adverting to all the particulars contained in the report, on the petition of Dr. Jenner, the discoverer of the cow pox, stated that Dr. Jenner had lost an extensive practice in this country, by his application in carrying into effect his discovery; and, when he had accomplished it, he voluntarily promulgated the secret for the benefit of the world. The expence of foreign correspondence with this gentleman, cost him from twenty-five to thirty shillings a-day, which to a man of fortune would be deemed considerable, but, to a man of none, it was a very serious consideration. The number of patients lost annually in the united kingdom by the small pox, was estimated at forty-five thousand; and, taking the number throughout the habitable globe, a victim fell every second of time to this destructive malady. He concluded by moving, "that it is the opinion of the committee, that a sum not exceeding ten thousand pounds, be granted to his majesty, to be paid as a remuneration to Dr. Edward Jenner, for promulgating the discovery of the vaccine inoculation, by which mode that dreadful malady, the small-pox, was prevented." Sir Henry Mildmay moved an amendment, that instead of the sum of ten thousand pounds, the words "twenty thousand pounds," should be inserted; which was also seconded. A long conversation ensued, and a division took place on the amendment. For the original motion to remunerate Dr. Jenner with a sum not exceeding ten thousand pounds, ayes fifty-nine, noes fifty-six, of course the amendment was lost.

The 26th of June being appointed for laying the foundation stone of that great national work, the London Docks, a vast concourse of persons assembled from all quarters, to witness a ceremony which commenced an undertaking of so much public utility. About two o'clock, the chancellor of the exchequer, lord Hawkesbury and Hobart, Mr. N. Vansittart, sir A. Hammond, and many other gentlemen, arrived at Wapping. They were conducted round the works adjacent to the river, and shewn the engines and plans. After which, they were conducted to the foundation of the entrance-basins, where two stones were prepared to be laid, each weighing about two tons and a half. The first stone was laid by the chancellor of the exchequer, lord Hawkesbury, and sir Richard Neave, chairman, and Edward Forster, deputy chairman. When this stone was laid, two glass bottles, containing the gold, silver, and copper coins, of the present reign, with a medal of the king's recovery, and the peace, were deposited in a hole made in the stone; and over them a tin plate, containing the following inscription was placed:—"This stone was laid on Saturday, the twenty-sixth of June, Ann. Dom. 1802, in the foundation of the entrance basin of the London Docks, undertaken by private subscription, for the greater accommodation and security of SHIPPING, COMMERCE, and REVENUE, within the port of London; and pursuant to an act passed on the twenty-sixth day of June, Ann. Dom. 1800 in the fortieth year of the reign of George the Third."

The chancellor of the exchequer threw a purse of gold on the stone for the workmen; after which the second stone was laid. Three times three cheers were then given both to the first and second stones.

The order of the day for the second reading of a bill for abolishing the practice of bull-baiting and bull-running, being read in the house of commons, sir Richard Hill rose, in order to give his decided support to the measure; as the bill went to abolish a practice which the common sense, the dignity, the decorum, and the piety of the house, would concur in condemning. The honourable baronet then read an extract from the Bury paper; which stated that a bull, which in the morning was tame and gentle, had been fastened to a ring, and gored till it became furious: it was then baited by dogs and more brutal men, to the great danger of the inhabitants of that place. After being baited for some time it got loose, and was secured; and was again fastened with ropes, and his hoofs cut off. "Good God!" said the honourable baronet, "what an age we live in, when a poor dumb animal, given by the Almighty for the support and succour of man, and to whom we ought to be tender and careful, is tortured by those who are worse than savages." He then quoted sir Matthew Hale's sentiments on mercy, as well as those of king Solomon. That wise man had said, "the merciful man sheweth mercy to his beast, but the mercy of the wicked is cruelty." This sentiment had never been called in question in this country, whatever it might have been in a neighbouring nation.

Mr. Windham, after some sarcastical observations, on affected mercy and tenderness, said he was inclined to check every cruelty to brutes, but he never would pretend on that account, that he had more humanity than those who delighted in such sports. He did not see why contemplating the courage of the bull-dog was not as rational a source of amusement, as admiring the sagacity of the hound, or the quick eye of the hawk. Gentlemen were often fond of shooting, and he supposed there was no cruelty in that sport. None but persons of the most delicate sensibility practised that mode of killing animals. If the present bill should pass, he would move to bring in one to do away hunting, shooting, and all the cruel amusements of the higher orders.

Colonel Grosvenor thought the house ought not to interfere in the amusements of the common people: the higher orders had their Billington, and the lower might be permitted to have their Bull.

Mr. Sheridan repeated a number of instances, in which the savage barbarity of men was displayed, in the methods which worrying of bulls was taught and encouraged in dogs. Among others, he mentioned a circumstance in which the master set the bitch to pin a bull, and in order to prove its blood and pertinacity, cut the bitch's head off, together with some of the other limbs, and afterwards sold the puppies at four guineas a piece. He asked what sort of feeling or gratitude did a proceeding of this kind teach to the young and tender mind? He declared his resolution of voting in favour of the bill. The house then divided.—Ayes 51, noes 64; majority 13. Consequently the bill was lost, and bull-baiting was not suppressed (o).

On the 28th of June, the king repaired, in his state-coach

(o) The virtues of generosity and gratitude are so strongly pourtrayed in the following correspondence between sir Francis Burdett and the rev. Dr. Parr, that an insertion of the two epistles cannot be deemed intrusive:

"Sir,

"I am sorry that it is not in my power to place you in a situation which would well become you—I mean in the episcopal palace at Bugden:

coach to the house of lords, where he delivered a speech from the throne, and prorogued the houses of parliament. The speech announced an intention of immediately dissolving the present, and calling a new parliament: in consequence of which, a proclamation was issued by his majesty, on the following day, for the purpose of dissolving the parliament.

In the Conservative Senate in Paris, about this time, Napoleon Bonaparte was proclaimed Chief Consul for life. At the same time it was decreed, that a statue of peace, holding in one hand the laurel of victory, and in the other the decree of the senate, shall attest to posterity the gratitude of the nation. The senate engaged to convey to the first consul the expression of the confidence, the love, and the admiration of the French people.

Much has been said of the commission of suicide in England, and that crime has been strongly imputed by foreigners to those islanders as a kind of national propensity; but by advices from Vienna we are credibly informed, that within the space of two months, forty-seven suicides had been committed in that city: in consequence of which it is said to have been in contemplation, to order the dead bodies of those who were their own destroyers, to be hung on the gallows by the public executioner, in order to deter others from the commission of this desperate act.

On Wednesday, December 21, 1802, the king was pleased to grant the dignities of baron and viscount of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to the right honourable Henry Dundas, and his heirs male, by the names, stiles, and titles of Baron of Durina, in the county of Perth, and Viscount Melville, in the county of Edinburgh (g).

On the 4th of November, in the afternoon, the French ambassador, general Andreossi, arrived at Quillacq's hotel, Calais. The muncipality went out in procession to meet him, and he was saluted with repeated discharges of cannon on his arrival at Calais; the military being determined to pay him every mark of honour. On the succeeding morning he went on board the Parfait Union, captain Moscou, for Dover. He was again saluted with discharges of artillery, and escorted by the military to the water-side; and at half after six he set sail amidst a grand discharge of cannon. As there was but little wind, he was not expected to reach Dover before five in the evening. The military were under arms to receive him.

Lord Whitworth, the British ambassador, arrived at Calais on the 14th, after a pleasant passage. He was received on his landing, by an immense concourse of people, and with loud huzzaing. The guns were fired, and the flags displayed on the church-steeples. When his excellency arrived at the inn, where a captain's guard mounted, he was complimented by the constitutional authorities, consisting of the mayors, the commissary-general Mengaud, the juge de paix, &c. After these, general Barbasanne advanced, at the head of the officers of the garrison. Dinner being ended, his excellency and suite were formally invited to accompany them at the theatre, in order, as they declared, that the public might have an opportunity of seeing what had been so long and so ardently desired, an English ambassador in France. They were received with enthusiastic joy!—"God save the king," was struck up, and played for a quarter of an hour, attended with the plaudits of the whole house, who stood up whilst it was playing, in the good old English fashion.

On the 17th, the ambassador from the French republic was introduced to the king, and had his formal audience at St. James's. The French ambassador and his suite, being properly apprized by persons from that court, of the order of proceeding, his excellency's carriage was at his door, in Portland-place, before one o'clock; where a considerable number of persons were assembled to see him set off: about a quarter after one he appeared, dressed in a general's uniform of the consular guard. When he arrived at St. James's he was conducted by sir Stephen Cotterell, Andreossi having his credentials in his hand. After some time, his majesty went into the presence chamber, when his excellency was introduced to him by sir Stephen Cotterel, and presented his credentials.

On the day following a circumstance of a very different nature occurred. Information being given to Mr. Carpenter Smith, and another magistrate at Union Hall, a search warrant was issued, and Mr. Stafford, the chief clerk, attended by a numerous body of peace officers, went to the Oakley Arms, in Oakley Street, Lambeth; where they apprehended colonel Despard, and twenty-nine labouring men and soldiers, the major part of them Irish,

---

Bugden: but I can bring you very near to it; for I have the presentation to a rectory now vacant within a mile and a half of it, which is very much at Dr. Parr's service. It is the rectory of Graffham, at present worth two hundred pounds a-year, and, as I am informed, may soon be worth two hundred and seventy; and I this moment learn that the incumbent died last Tuesday.

"Dr. Parr's talents and character might well entitle him to better patronage than this, from those who know how to estimate his merits; but I acknowledge that a great additional motive with me to the offer I now make him is, that I believe I cannot do any thing more pleasing to his friends, Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, and Mr. Knight; and I desire you, Sir, to consider yourself obliged to them only. I have the honour to be, Sir, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,

"FRANCIS BURDETT."

"Dear Sir, "Vicarage-house, Bugden, Sept. 26, 1802.

"After rambling in various parts of Norfolk, I went to Cambridge, and from Cambridge I yesterday came to the parsonage of my most respectable friend Mr. Maltby, at Buckden, where I this morning had the honour of receiving your letter. Mrs. Parr opened it last Friday at Hatton, and I trust you will pardon the liberty she took in desiring your servant to convey it to me in Huntingdonshire, where she knew that I should be as upon this day.

"Permit me, dear Sir, to request that you would accept the warmest and most sincere thanks of my heart, for this unsolicited, but most honourable expression of your good will towards me. Nothing can be more important to my worldly interests than the service you have done me in presenting me to the living of Graffham. Nothing can be more exquisitely gratifying to my very best feeling, than the language in which you have conveyed to me this mark of your friendship. Indeed, dear Sir, you have enabled me to pass the years of declining life in comfortable and honourable independence. You have given me additional and unalterable conviction, that the firmness with which I have adhered to my principles, has obtained for me the approbation of wise and good men. And when that approbation assumes, as it now does, the form of protection, I fairly confess to you, that the patronage of sir Francis Burdett has a right to be ranked among the proudest, as well as the happiest events of my life."

After some further effusions of gratitude from the reverend doctor, he thus concludes—"The living of Graffham will be of infinite value to me, because it is tenable with a rectory I now have in Northamptonshire: and happy I am, that my future residence will be fixed, and my existence closed, upon that spot where sir Francis Burdett has given me the power of spending my old age with comforts and conveniencies quite equal to the extent of my fondest wishes, and far surpassing any expectation I have hitherto ventured to indulge. I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect and most unfeigned thankfulness, dear sir, your very obedient and faithful servant. "S. PARR."

A privy council was held on the eighteenth of September, at Windsor, at which a proclamation was issued, and published in the Gazette, summoning parliament to meet on the sixteenth of November.

At Stirbitch theatre, on the evening of the 28th of October, the ladies and gentlemen in one of the front boxes, were alarmed with the cry of fire, from behind the boxes, but not loud enough to be heard by the audience in general: they immediately arose, and, perceiving nothing extraordinary, were inclinable to be seated again; but, hearing the cry repeated, began to hasten to the doors: every part of the house was now extremely alarmed, and great confusion ensued. Many from the gallery began to throw themselves over into the pit: others ran to the stairs and greatly impeded the passage; whilst some fell headlong down the stairs and were trodden under foot. Ladies and gentlemen from the upper boxes, precipitated themselves into the pit, and clambered over the orchestra to the stage. Many persons of both sexes were much bruised, and several limbs were broken. Four lives were absolutely lost. A gang of pickpockets were supposed to have visited the fair, and spread a false alarm to aid them in their depredations, as several ladies' pockets were cut off, and watches, trinkets, &c. were lost. A reward of one hundred guineas was offered by the managers, on conviction of the offender or offenders.

(g) The following grant reflects equal honour on the bestower and the receiver: Whitehall, Jan. 7, 1803. The king has been graciously pleased in consideration of the signal services performed to his majesty, and to his ally the Ottoman emperor, by sir William Sidney Smith, knt. commander, and grand cross of the royal Swedish military order of the sword, a captain in the royal navy, and representative of the city of Rochester;—and to evince the sense which his majesty entertains of the great ability and heroic perseverance, manifested by him the said sir William Sidney Smith upon divers occasions, and more especially of his able and highly distinguished conduct in defence of the town of St. John d'Acre, in Syria, in 1799; his majesty grants certain augmentations to the armorial ensigns borne by his family. [Here follow the particulars.] The said arms and crest to be borne by him, and by his issue, together with the motto of Cœur de Lion. And though the privilege of bearing supporters be limited to the peers of the realm, the knights of his majesty's orders, and the proxies of princes of the blood royal at installations, except under particular circumstances: yet, in order to give a further testimony of his majesty's particular approbation of the services of the said sir William Sidney Smith, he has been graciously pleased to allow him to bear, for supporters to his arms, a tiger guardant, navally crowned; in the mouth a palm branch, being the symbol of victory, supporting the union-flag of Great Britain, together with the inscription (JERUSALEM 1799) upon the cross of St. George; and a lamb, murally crowned; in the mouth an olive branch, being the symbol of peace, supporting the banner of Jerusalem.

and conducted them to Union Hall. The next morning this intelligence was communicated by the Union Hall magistrates to sir Richard Ford, who was then at his house in Sloane Street. Sir Richard with his usual diligence, repaired to Union Hall, where colonel Despard underwent a long private examination before him and three other magistrates, after which he was committed to the county gaol of Surrey. The warrant of commitment expressly charged him with conspiring to compass the death of the king, and was grounded upon the oath of the soldier who gave the information, with the circumstances arising out of his examination. The remaining twenty-nine were committed without any examination; fourteen of them to Tothill Fields Bridewell, and fifteen to the house of correction in Cold Bath Fields. The party when surprized, said they were a club that met there for innocent recreation. This was the only account they gave of themselves; but a printed form of an oath was found in the room where they were sitting.

Colonel Despard was afterwards examined by the privy council, before whom he was taken hand-cuffed and very heavily ironed. Mrs. Despard applied for admission to see him, which was refused, and she withdrew, after having waited above an hour in the anti-chamber. When the colonel was brought out, he walked with great difficulty, in consequence of the weight of his irons. He was conveyed in a hackney-coach strongly guarded to Newgate.

On the 9th of February, colonel Edward Marcus Despard was tried at the New Sessions House, in the Borough of Southwark, before lord Ellenborough for high-treason. After hearing the evidence, and the lord chief justice's comments on the several particulars, the jury withdrew for about half an hour; when they returned and pronounced a verdict of guilty against the prisoner.

The court then, pursuant to adjournment, met at nine o'clock on the following morning, and proceeded to the trial of John Wood, Thomas Broughton, John Francis, Thomas Phipps, Thomas Newman, John Doyle, Daniel Tyndall, James Sedwick Wratton, William Lander, Arthur Graham, Samuel Smith, and John M'Namara. After hearing the evidence, the jury retired for an hour and thirty minutes: they then returned a verdict of guilty, against the following nine prisoners: John Wood, Thomas Broughton, John Francis, Thomas Newman, Daniel Tyndall, J. Sedwick Wratton, William Lander, Arthur Graham, and John M'Namara. The learned judge, after a general address to the miserable wretches who were doomed to suffer on this occasion, thus particularly and pathetically lamented the conduct of colonel Despard:—"You Edward Marcus Despard, in whom the dignified pride of birth, the advantages of a liberal education, and the habits of intercourse in that rank, in which your conduct was once so highly honourable, and from the testimony borne of your former conduct, by the honourable companions of your earlier pursuits, adduced in this court as witnesses for your character, should have induced us to expect widely different conduct and principles: how grossly have you misapplied and abused the talents and opportunities which you enjoyed for honourable distinction in society; and how have you degraded yourself to the association of those unfortunate and wretched companions, by whom you are now surrounded, in whose ignominious fate you so justly share; but who are the unhappy victims of your seducive persuasion and example. I do not wish, at this aweful moment, to urge any thing to you, and the degrading companions by whom you are surrounded, to sharpen the bitterness of your feelings, under the ignominy of your fate; but would earnestly and sincerely wish to impress your mind, during the short period of your remaining life, with a due sense of your aweful situation, and of the criminal conduct which has involved you in your present ignominious fate: I would earnestly entreat you zealously to endeavour to subdue the callous insensibility of heart, of which in an ill-fated hour, you have boasted (h), and regain that sanative affection of the mind, which may prepare your soul for that salvation, which by the infinite mercy of God I hope you may obtain."

On the 14th of February, John Peltier was convicted, in the court of King's Bench, of a libel against Napoleon Bonaparte, first consul and chief magistrate of the French republic. Lord Ellenborough declared, that such publications against the character and person of a foreign magistrate could not pass unnoticed in this country, as they had a direct tendency to interrupt and destroy the peace now happily subsisting between the two countries; and therefore, in point of law, a libel.

An account of an official correspondence appeared in the Moniteur, between the plenipotentiary of the grand master of the Order of Malta, and sir A. Ball. It appeared that M. de Thomasi, the new grand master, had dispatched his lieutenant M. de Bussy, invested with full power to take possession of the island, where he arrived on the 28th of February. M. de Bussy's first step was to demand the delivery of the place, to which he received only a verbal answer in the negative, from the governor: not satisfied with this, he wrote a letter, containing a formal demand of the place by virtue of the fourth paragraph of the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens. To this address, sir A. Ball returned an explicit answer, stating, that as some of the powers invited by the tenth article of the treaty to guarantee the independence of Malta, had not yet acceded to that measure; he did not think himself authorized to put an end to the government of his majesty in that island, until he received special instructions from his court.

Shortly after the above, letters from Malta gave intelligence of some very unpleasant disturbances that had taken place at the opera there, with general Vial, the French minister, in consequence of his refusal to stand up, or take off his hat when "God save the King" was played: the riot was so great at first, as to hinder the performance of the piece; and on the next night, when general Vial's family went there without him, the ladies were hissed out of the house, on their refusing to stand up when the rest of the audience did, on the performance of that tune. It has by some been thought, that, from general Vial's conduct on this occasion, he wished to draw some insult upon himself, that strong remonstrances might be transmitted to his court upon the subject. But the fact might be widely different: he, doubtless, thought the island then belonged of right to his own master; and, consequently, that he ought not to pay that mark of respect to the British king, at that particular time.

To shew how greatly Britons were averse to corruption, the following circumstance of punishment for an attempt to commit such an offence, may afford consolation to the lovers of integrity. Thomas Hamlin, convicted of offering Mr. Addington two thousand pounds for the place of landing officer at Plymouth, was carried into court to receive judgement. Mr. justice Grose, after stating the enormity of his offence, in soliciting that to be done by a bribe, which if complied with, would tend to the total destruction of all honour and prosperity in the country, as far as connected with its ministers, hoped the sentence the court should inflict upon him would deter other persons from similar attempts. The sentence awarded, that he should pay a fine of one hundred pounds, and be imprisoned in the King's Bench for three months.

Early in March, 1803, the chancellor of the exchequer delivered the following message from his majesty at the bar of the house: "G. R. His majesty having taken into his most gracious consideration the eminent services of rear-admiral sir James Saumarez, knight of the most honourable Order of the Bath, and particularly the valour, promptness, and intrepidity he displayed in an engagement with a Spanish squadron, upon the 12th of July, 1801, in the Straits of Gibraltar, recommends it to his faithful commons to grant unto him, the said sir James Saumarez, K. B. an annuity of twelve hundred pounds for the term of his natural life." The house having resolved itself into a committee

(h) On the day of execution, the colonel addressed the multitude in precisely the following words: "Fellow citizens, I come here as you see, after having served my country faithfully, honourably, and I trust usefully, for thirty years and upwards, to suffer death upon a scaffold, for a crime which I am no more guilty of than any who is now looking at me. I do solemnly declare, that I am no more guilty, than any of you who may now be listening to me. But though his majesty's ministers know I am not guilty, they avail themselves of this opportunity, which they have, of destroying a man, because they think he is a friend to truth, to liberty, and to justice; and because he has been a friend to the poor and the oppressed. But, fellow citizens, I hope and trust, notwithstanding my fate, and perhaps the fate of many others, who may follow me, that still the principles of liberty, justice, and humanity, will triumph over falsehood, despotism, and delusion, and every thing else hostile to the interests of the human race. And now, having said this, I have nothing more to add, but to wish you all that health, that happiness, and that freedom, which I have ever made it my endeavour, as far as it lay in my power, to procure for every one of you, and for mankind in general."

Part of the sentence which is usually pronounced against traitors was remitted with respect to these, they were only to be drawn and hanged, and their heads separated from the body.

committee on his majesty's message, the chancellor of the exchequer observed, that it would not be necessary for him to offer many arguments to induce the committee to accede to the motion which he should have the honour to make, respecting his majesty's most gracious communication. The name of sir James Saumarez, he said, would suggest reflections highly gratifying to every feeling and honourable mind, who could appreciate justly the importance of the naval character to the country. To describe the services of the gallant admiral, would be to refer to some of the most memorable atchievements to be found in the naval history, from the year 1780 to the present time. This consideration had induced his majesty to resort to the recommendation now before the committee; the adoption of which would serve as a fresh incentive to additional exploits, and must animate the brave defenders of the country to future exertions, worthy of the British flag, and the glory of the nation. He then moved, that the annual sum of twelve hundred pounds be granted to his majesty, to enable him to reward the services of rear-admiral sir James Saumarez, out of the consolidated fund of Great Britain; and the motion was agreed to nem. con.

Previous to this honourable testimony of the admiral's merits, the chamberlain of London, accompanied by the lord mayor, alderman le Mesurier, and several other gentlemen, assembled at the chamberlain's office, in Guildhall, had presented to admiral sir James Saumarez, the thanks, and the sword voted to him by the official representatives of the city of London. On this occasion, the chamberlain, seated in his chair, thus addressed the admiral: "Admiral sir James Saumarez, I give you joy, and in pursuance of the unanimous resolution of the lord mayor, aldermen, and corporation of the city of London, in common-council assembled, offer you the thanks of the court for the very important and splendid victories obtained by the force under your command over a Spanish and French fleet of superior force, on the 6th of July, 1801, off Algeziras; and on the 13th of the same month, off Cape Trafalgar. It was farther resolved, that you should be admitted to the freedom of this great city; that your name should be placed among those of the illustrious characters which adorn the civic roll: and, as a testimony of the sense the court entertains of the eminent services rendered by you, to your country, that you should be presented with this SWORD.—Long, very long, Sir, may you continue to wear those laurels, which so eminently and gracefully adorn your brow." &c.

Sir James Saumarez, who was then dressed in full uniform, received the sword, and returned a respectful answer to the following effect: "Mr. Chamberlain, I receive this sword, together with the freedom of the first city in the world, with the utmost gratitude; and feel the highest obligation to you, sir, for the flattering manner in which you have conveyed the resolution of the corporation, to record my name among the many illustrious characters which adorn this nation. And if foreign or domestic enemies should again disturb your quiet, I shall be proud to draw the sword in defence of my king and country."

We have to record a most extraordinary forgery, which took place on the 5th of May in the city of London; at an early hour in the morning, a pretended messenger arrived at the mansion-house, with a letter which he said he had received from lord Hawkesbury, and requested it might be delivered immediately to the lord mayor. The bearer of this epistle was booted and spurred, and had all the appearance of having just completed a long and fatiguing journey. Being informed that the lord mayor was not at home, he expressed some regret; but said he would leave the letter, and begged the servant would place it where his lordship might see it immediately on his return. The fabrication was accordingly found on the table when he revisited his city mansion; and he perused it with all those emotions of joy, which, as a friend to peace, such consoling information must give birth to. It was as follows:

LORD MAYOR.

Downing Street, Thursday morning, 8 o'clock, May 5, 1808.

"Lord Hawkesbury presents his compliments to the lord mayor, and has the honour to acquaint his lordship that the negociation between this country and the French republic is brought to an amicable conclusion."

The letter was sealed with lord Hawkesbury's seal.

The lord mayor, after some proper enquiries respecting the appearance of the person who was charged with the conveyance of this interesting epistle, was perfectly satisfied that no imposition had been practised on his credulity, and therefore instantly resolved to communicate the happy event to his fellow citizens. He copied the letter with his own hand, and caused it to be affixed in a conspicuous place on the outside of the mansion house. The contents were these:

May 5, 1803.

"Lord Hawkesbury has, this morning, informed the lord mayor, that the negociation with the French republic is brought to an amicable conclusion."

A second copy was sent to Lloyd's, and his lordship went himself with the original to the stock-exchange. Soon after he returned to the mansion-house, and wrote a letter to lord Hawkesbury, expressing his satisfaction on the occasion.

Printed notices were then posted round the custom-house, declaring the embargo to be taken off ships laden with salt-petre, &c. and, in consequence of this delusion, the funds experienced an immediate rise from 63¾ to 71¼. A real treasury messenger, however, was soon dispatched to announce the falsity of the intelligence: in consequence of which the genuine communication was read in the public street by the city marshal. The confusion which now prevailed was beyond all description: the stock-exchange was immediately shut, and the committee came to the following resolution: "That all bargains made in the morning, should be declared null and void." Some difficulty, however, arose respecting the actual purchase of stock for money, Mr. Templeton holding up a transfer receipt for reduced stock, which he had just made for the commissioners for liquidating the national debt. An appeal was therefore made to the directors of the bank, who gave it as their opinion, "that the money purchasers of reduced stock for government, made that day, should stand at yesterday's closing prices," viz. 64; but reserved the delivery of any opinion on the points of money-purchases till eleven o'clock on Friday! The subscribers then entered into a resolution, that all sales of the two days should be delivered to a committee of the house, to facilitate the discovery of the person who forged the notification. The consequence was a rapid fall of the funds from seventy-one to sixty-three. The bank directors afterwards altered their opinions respecting actual money bargains made in consequence of the forgery, and informed the stock-exchange committee, that the government commissioners had authorized them to pay the full price for the reduced stock, which their broker had thus purchased on their account, viz. sixty-nine and a half per cent.

In consequence of various reports, the stock-exchange committee prevailed on the lord mayor to address a note to lord Hawkesbury, soliciting information, and stating the occasion of his application. To this note, the chancellor of the exchequer returned the following answer:

"My lord,

"As lord Hawkesbury is not at the foreign office, I have opened your lordship's note, conformably to the wish expressed through your messenger. If any information had been received by government, which could properly be the subject of public communication, your lordship may be assured that such communication would not have been withheld. I feel it however my duty distinctly to caution your lordship against receiving impressions of the description alluded to, through any unauthorized channel of information.

"I have the honour to be, &c.

"HENRY ADDINGTON."

Downing Street, Saturday noon.

On Thursday the 19th of May, the day appointed by the sovereign, twenty-two knights of the most honourable order of the Bath, were installed in Westminster Abbey (i). About half an hour after twelve, the knights were all in Henry

(i) This order of knighthood was founded by Henry IV. and established by George the First, as a military order in 1725. The splendour and magnificence of the procession was highly gratifying to the spectators. Though the early hour of nine in the morning was appointed for opening the doors of the Abbey, a great number of carriages were in Dean's Yard (the place for entrance to the aisles) and an immense crowd of the populace were assembled in Old Palace Yard considerably before the appointed time. It is supposed there were about ten thousand spectators within the body of the church, in the course of the day. Every porch or niche in the building, which could afford a prospect of the procession, was fitted up as a temporary accommodation for visitors, which were chiefly of the first respectability; as tickets could only be obtained through the influence of the members of the order, the dignitaries of the cathedral, or the payment of a high premium proportioned

Henry the Seventh's chapel, the gates of which were immediately closed. The knights were then installed with great ceremony, and a little after three they returned to the prince's chamber. Lords Nelson, Keith, and Whitworth, and several others, were installed by proxy. The knights personally installed were sir Alured Clarke, sir Henry Harvey, sir J. F. Craddock, lord Henley, sir William Pitt, right honourable sir Joseph Banks, sir James Henry Craig, sir James Colpoys, lord Hutchinson, sir Eyre Coote, and sir David Dundas (k).

In giving an account of the extraordinary correspondence, for adjusting the differences between Great Britain and the French republic during the negociation, we shall submit to our readers those passages and papers which are of the most interesting nature. The correspondence began on the 23rd of May, 1802; but there is in it little more than the failure of every attempt to procure the complete execution of the treaty of Amiens, on the part of France. The letters are between lord Hawkesbury, M. Talleyrand, M. Otto, and Mr. Merry.

It appears that so far back as August, 1801, the following demands were made on our government. "1. That his majesty's government will adopt the most effectual measures to put a stop to the unbecoming and seditious publications with which the news-papers and other writings printed in England are filled. 2. That the individuals mentioned in the minister's letter of the 23rd of July last, shall be sent out of the island of Jersey. 3. That the former bishops of Arras and Saint Pol de Leon, and all those who, like them, under the pretext of religion, seek to raise disturbances in the interior of France, shall likewise be sent away. 4. That Georges and his adherents shall be transported to Canada, according to the intention which the undersigned has been directed to transmit to his government at the request of lord Hawkesbury. 5. That, in order to deprive the evil disposed of every pretext for disturbing the good understanding between the two governments, it shall be recommended to the princes of the house of Bourbon, at present in Great Britain, to repair to Warsaw, the residence of the head of their family. 6. That such of the French emigrants as shall think proper to wear the orders and decorations belonging to the ancient government of France, shall be required to quit the territory of the British empire."

In answer to these points, lord Hawkesbury says, in his letter to M. Otto, of the 28th of August—"The propositions in M. Otto's official note, are six in number, but may in fact be comprized under two heads: the first, that which relates to libels of all descriptions, which are alledged to be published against the French government; the last comprehending the five complaints which relate to French emigants resident in this country. On the first, I am convinced you must be aware, that his majesty cannot, and never will, in consequence of any representation, or any menace from a foreign power, make any concession, which can be in the smallest degree dangerous to the liberty of the press, as secured by the constitution of this country. This liberty is justly dear to every British subject. The constitution admits of no previous restraint upon publications of any description; but there exist judicatures, wholly independent of the executive government, capable of taking cognizance of such publications as the law deems to be criminal, and which are bound to inflict the punishment the delinquents may deserve: these judicatures may take cognizance, not only of libels against the government and the magistracy of this kingdom, but, as has been repeatedly experienced, of publications defamatory of those in whose hands the administration of foreign governments is placed.

"With respect to the complaints in detail under the second head, you may, in the first place, inform the French government, that the emigrants in Jersey, many of whom had remained there solely on account of the cheapness of subsistence, had actually removed, or were removing, previous to the representation concerning them in M. Otto's note; and that before your explanation with M. Talleyrand can take place, there will probably not be an emigrant in the island. To the second complaint, which relates to the bishops of Arras and St. Pol de Leon, and others, his majesty can only reply, that if the facts alledged against them can be substantiated, if it can be proved that they have distributed papers on the coast of France, with a view of disturbing the government, and of inducing the people to resist the new church establishment, his majesty would think himself justified in taking all measures within his power, for obliging them to leave the country; but some proof must be adduced of those facts; and such proof must not be that of their having in a single instance, viz. on a reply to the pope's mandate, published a vindication of their own conduct, in refusing to conform to the new establishment, a proceeding in which they would be justifiable on every principle of toleration and justice; but it should shew that they have since availed themselves of their situation in this country, to excite the people of France against that government, whether civil or ecclesiastical.

On the third complaint, which respects the removal of Georges, and those persons supposed to be described as his adherents, M. Otto must have mistaken me in what he supposes me to have said on that subject. His majesty is, however, very desirous to obviate any cause of complaint or uneasiness with respect to these persons; and measures are in contemplation, and will be taken, for the purpose of removing them out of his majesty's European dominions.

On the fourth complaint, respecting the princes of the house of Bourbon, I can only inform you, that his majesty has no desire that they should continue to reside in this country, if they are disposed, or can be induced to quit it; but he feels it to be inconsistent with his honour, and his sense of justice, to withdraw from them the rights of hospitality, as long as they conduct themselves peaceably and quietly; and unless some charge can be substantiated of their attempting to disturb the peace which subsists between the two governments.

"With respect to the fifth complaint, which relates to the French emigrants wearing in this country the orders of their ancient government; there are few, if any, persons of that description in this country, who wear such orders: it might be more proper if they all abstained from it; but the French government could not persist in expecting, that even if it were consistent with law, his majesty would be induced to commit so harsh an act of authority as to send them out of the country on such an account."

The French government, unable to succeed in these points, next attempted to obtain the evacuation of Malta; and, upon that and other topics, an interesting conversation took place, between lord Whitworth and the First Consul, which is detailed in his lordship's letter to lord Hawkesbury: the contents of which are too interesting and important to admit of any alteration, mutilation, or abridgement:

"My lord, Paris, Feb. 21, 1803.

"My last dispatch, in which I gave your lordship an account of my conference with M. de Talleyrand, was scarcely gone, when I received a note from him, informing me, that the first consul wished to converse with me, and desired I would come to him at the Thuilleries, at nine o'clock. He received me in his cabinet with tolerable cordiality, and, after talking on different subjects for a few minutes, he desired me to sit down, as he himself did on the other side of the table, and began. He told me that he felt it necessary, after what had passed between me and M. de Talleyrand, that he should in the most clear and authentic manner, make known his sentiments to me, in order to their being communicated to his majesty; and he conceived this would be more effectually done by himself, than through any medium whatever. He said that it was a matter of infinite disappointment to him, that the treaty of Amiens, instead of being followed by conciliation and friendship, the natural effects of peace, had been productive only of continual and increasing jealousy and mistrust; and that this distrust was now avowed in such a manner, as could not fail to bring the point to issue.

"He then enumerated the several provocations which he pretended to have received from England. He placed tioned to the eligibility of the situation. A covered platform was prepared, with the flooring elegantly matted, extending from the house of lords, across Old Palace Yard, to communicate with the Abbey at the Poet's Corner. On this the procession passed from the prince's chamber in the house of lords, to the Abbey, about eleven o'clock. It was near twelve before they reached the further end of the great aisle, where the queen and princesses were seated in a gallery embellished for the purpose by the dean. His royal highness the duke of York, as grand master, walked last of the order, with his train-bearers and attendants following.

(k) Within the door of the abbey, the king's master cook delivered the following admonition to each companion:—"Sir knight, the great oath that you have taken, if you keep it, will be great honour to you; but if you break it, I have power, by virtue of my office, to break the spurs from off your heels."

in

in the first line our not evacuating Malta and Alexandria, as we were bound to do by treaty. In this, he said, that no consideration on earth should make him acquiesce; and, of the two, he had rather see us in possession of the Fauxburgh Saint Antoine, than Malta. He then adverted to the abuse thrown out against him in the English public prints; but this, he said, he did not so much regard, as that which appeared in the French papers published in London. This he considered as much more mischievous, since it was meant to excite this country against him and his government. He complained of the protection given to Georges, and others of his description, who, instead of being sent to Canada, as had been repeatedly promised, were permitted to remain in England, handsomely pensioned, and constantly committing all sorts of crimes on the coasts of France, as well as in the interior. In confirmation of this, he told me that two men had within these few days been apprehended in Normandy, and were now on their way to Paris, who were hired assassins, and were employed by the bishop of Arras, by the baron de Rolle, by Georges, and by Dutheil, as would be fully proved in a court of justice, and made known to the world.

"He acknowledged, that the irritation he felt against England increased daily, because every wind (I make use, as much as I can, of his own ideas and expressions) which blew from England, brought nothing but enmity and hatred against him.

"He next adverted to Egypt, and told me, that if he had felt the smallest inclination to take possession of it by force, he might have done it a month ago, by sending twenty-five thousand men to Aboukir, who would have possessed themselves of the whole country, in defiance of the four thousand British in Alexandria. That instead of that garrison being a mean of protecting Egypt, it was only furnishing him with a pretence for invading it. This he should not do, whatever might be his desire to have it as a colony, because he did not think it worth the risk of a war, in which he might perhaps be considered as the aggressor, and by which he should lose more than he could gain; since, sooner or later, Egypt would belong to France, either by the falling to pieces of the Turkish empire, or by some arrangement with the Porte.

"As a proof of his desire to maintain peace, he wished to know what he had to gain by going to war with England. A descent was the only mean of offence he had, and that he was determined to attempt, by putting himself at the head of the expedition. But, how could it be supposed, that, after having gained the height on which he stood, he could risk his life and reputation in such a hazardous attempt, unless forced to it by necessity, when the chances were, that he and the greatest part of the expedition, would go to the bottom of the sea? He talked much on this subject, but never affected to diminish the danger. He acknowledged that there were one hundred chances to one against him; but still he was determined to attempt it, if war should be the consequence of the present discussion; and that such was the disposition of the troops, that army after army would be found for the enterprize.

"He then expatiated much on the natural force of the two countries. France, with an army of four hundred and eighty thousand men, (for, to this amount, it is, he said, to be immediately completed,) all ready for the most desperate enterprizes; and England with a fleet that made her mistress of the seas, and which he did not think he should be able to equal in less than ten years. Two such countries, by a proper understanding, might govern the world, but by their strifes might overturn it. He said, that if he had not felt the enmity of the British government on every occasion, since the treaty of Amiens, there would have been nothing that he would not have done to prove his desire to conciliate; participation in indemnities, as well as in influence on the continent; treaties of commerce; in short, any thing that could have given satisfaction. Nothing, however, had been able to conquer the hatred of the British government, and therefore it was now come to the point, whether we should have peace or war. To preserve peace, the treaty of Amiens must be fulfilled; the abuse in the public prints, if not totally suppressed, at least kept within bounds, and confined to the English papers; and the protection so openly given to his bitterest enemies (alluding to Georges, and persons of that description) must be withdrawn. If war, it was necessary only to say so, and to refuse to fulfil the treaty. He now made the tour of Europe to prove to me, that in its present state, there was no power with which we could coalesce for the purpose of making war against France; consequently it was our interest to gain time, and if we had any point to gain, renew the war when circumstances were more favourable. He said, it was not doing him justice to suppose, that he conceived himself above the opinion of his country, or of Europe. He would not risk uniting Europe against him by any violent act of aggression, neither was he so powerful in France, as to persuade the nation to go war, unless on good grounds. He said, that he had not chastised the Algerines, from his unwillingness to excite the jealousy of other powers; but he hoped that England, Russia, and France, would one day feel that it was their interest to destroy such a nest of thieves; and force them to live rather by cultivating their land than by plunder.

"In the little I said to him, for he gave me in the course of two hours but very few opportunities of saying a word, I confined myself strictly to the tenor of your lordship's instructions. I urged them in the same manner as I had done to M. de Talleyrand, and dwelt as strongly as I could on the sensation which the publication of Sebastiani's report had created in England, where the views of France towards Egypt must always command the utmost vigilance and jealousy. He maintained, that what ought to convince us of his desire of peace, was, on the one hand, the little he had to gain by renewing the war, and on the other, the facility with which he might have taken possession of Egypt, with the very ships and troops which were now going from the Mediterranean to St. Domingo; and that with the approbation of all Europe, and more particularly of the Turks, who had repeatedly invited him to join with them, for the purpose of forcing us to evacuate their territory.

"I do not mean to follow the arguments of the first consul in detail: this would be impossible, from the vast variety of matter which he took occasion to introduce. His purpose was evidently to convince me, that on Malta must depend peace or war; and at the same time to impress upon my mind a strong idea of the means he possessed of annoying us at home and abroad.

"With regard to the mistrust and jealousy, which he said constantly prevailed since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, I observed that after a war of such long duration, so full of rancour, and carried on in a manner of which history has no example, it was but natural, that a considerable degree of agitation should prevail; but this, like the swell after a storm, would gradually subside, if not kept up by the policy of either party; that I would not pretend to pronounce which had been the aggressor in the paper war of which he complained, and which was still kept up, though with this difference, that in England it was independent of the government, and in France its very act and deed. To this I added, that it must be admitted, that we had such motives of mistrust against France, as could not be alledged against us; and I was going to instance the accession of territory and influence gained by France since the treaty, when he interrupted me by saying, I suppose you mean Piedmont and Switzerland; "ce sont des bagatelles:" and it must have been foreseen whilst the negociation was pending: "vous n'avez par le droit d'en parler à cette heure." I then alledged, as a cause of mistrust and jealousy, the impossibility of obtaining justice, or any kind of redress for any of his majesty's subjects. He asked me in what respect? and I told him that since the signing of the treaty, not one British claimant had been satisfied, though every Frenchman of that description had been so within one month after that period; and that since I had been here, and I could say as much of my predecessors, not one satisfactory answer had been obtained to the innumerable representations which we had been under the necessity of making in favour of British subjects, and property detained in the several ports of France, and elsewhere, without even a shadow of justice. Such an order of things, I said, was not made to inspire confidence, but, on the contrary, must create mistrust. This, he said, must be attributed to the natural difficulties attending suits, when both parties thought themselves right, but he denied that such delays could proceed from any disinclination to do what was just and right. With regard to the pensions which were granted to French or Swiss individuals, I observed that they were given as a reward for past services during the war, and most certainly not for present ones, and still less for such as had been insinuated of a nature repugnant to the feelings of every individual in England, and to the universally acknowledged loyalty and honour of the British government. That as for any participation of indemnities, or other accessions which his majesty jesty might have obtained, I could take upon myself to assure him, that his majesty's ambition led him rather to preserve than to acquire. And that with regard to the most propitious moment for renewing hostilities, his majesty, whose sincere desire it was to continue the blessings of peace to his subjects, would always consider such a measure as the greatest calamity; but, that though his majesty was so desirous of peace, it must not be imputed to the difficulty of obtaining allies; and the less so, as those means which it might be necessary to afford such allies, for perhaps inadequate services, would be concentrated in England, and give a proportionate increase of energy to our own exertions.

"At this part of the conversation, he rose from his chair, and told me that he should give orders to general Andreossi to enter on the discussion of this business with your lordship: but he wished that I should, at the same time, be made acquainted with his motives, and convinced of his sincerity, rather from himself than from his ministers. He then, after a conversation of two hours, during the greatest part of which he talked incessantly, conversed for a few moments on indifferent subjects, in apparent good humour, and retired."

Such being a true statement of the case, adverse measures seemed to portend a breach of that harmony between this country and the French republic, which indeed had not been cordially cemented by the treaty of Amiens. Hostile preparations were making in France and Holland, to an immoderate extent, which naturally created suspicions that faithless and dishonourable proceedings were meditating against Great Britain. His majesty, therefore, thought proper to resent such insidious measures. Lord Hobart was consequently dispatched, on the 8th of March, with a message from his majesty to the house of lords, which was couched in the following terms:

"GEORGE REX.

"His majesty thinks it necessary to acquaint the house of lords, that as very considerable military preparations are carrying on in the ports of France and Holland, he has judged it expedient to adopt additional measures of precaution for the security of his dominions, though the preparations to which his majesty refers, are avowedly directed to colonial service, yet as discussions of great importance are now subsisting between his majesty and the French government, the result of which must at present be uncertain, his majesty is induced to make this communication, in the full persuasion that, whilst they partake of his majesty's earnest and unvarying solicitude for the continuance of peace, he may rely with perfect confidence on their public spirit and liberality, to enable his majesty to adopt such measures as circumstances may appear to require, for supporting the honour of his crown, and the essential interests of his people."

The order of the day, for taking into consideration his majesty's message being read, lord Hobart said, that to the motion which he should have the honour to make upon this occasion, he would not anticipate a dissenting voice. His majesty had stated in the message, that preparations of considerable magnitude were carried on in two countries with which we had recently been at war. These preparations, it was but just to observe, might be fully authorized, up to the whole extent to which they had hitherto been carried, by the state of the French possessions abroad. But when it was considered that his majesty also informed them, there were discussions of great importance subsisting between the two countries, the necessity of our making a proportionate addition to our means of security, must be obvious to the unanimous sense of that house, and of the country. He concluded by moving an address of thanks to his majesty.

Lord Spencer declared, that the system of concession had been too long tried; if it had been sooner departed from, he should have augured better for the continuance of peace. He hoped, that the spirit which had begun to be manifested, would be followed up with equal vigour; and he entertained the firmest conviction, that there was not a man in the country, who was not ready, with the last drop of his blood, and the last shilling of his property, to support his majesty in the assertion of the honour of his crown, and the rights of his people.

Lords Grenville, Moira, Westmoreland, and Auckland supported the address, which was agreed to nem. dis.

When his majesty's message to this effect, was read in the house of commons, the chancellor of the exchequer moved that it might be taken into the consideration of the whole house the next day, which was ordered accordingly.

The following day, therefore, Mr. Addington moved the order of the day, for the house taking into consideration his majesty's message; which message having been read by the speaker, Mr. Addington moved an address to his majesty, expressive of the acknowledgements of the house, for the gracious communication which they had received. Having made a few suitable observations on the business, he concluded by moving, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, "to return his majesty the thanks of the house for his most gracious message; and to assure his majesty, that his faithful commons will, with the utmost cheerfulness, support his majesty in the adoption of such measures as circumstances may appear to require, for maintaining the honour of his majesty's crown, and the essential interests of his people."

The question being put, Mr. Fox said, he did not rise to oppose the motion for the address; but hoped his majesty's advisers would seriously consider the present situation of the British empire; for if they should involve the country in a war, which should afterwards be found not to be necessary, they would be more guilty than any ministers that ever advised such a measure in any other period of our history.

Lord Hawkesbury said, if unfortunately these discussions should lead to war, it would be the duty of his majesty's ministers to lay before the house every information respecting their conduct, and the causes of the war.

Mr. Windham said, all that he could learn from the statement of the chancellor of the exchequer was, that the measures of precaution about to be adopted, were to be of a defensive kind; and for that reason he must protest against the present mode of proceeding. The force to be raised ought to be calculated for offence as well as defence. Perhaps it might now be said, that those gentlemen who had so warmly disapproved of the peace, were glad to catch at any thing like a renewal of the war. That would certainly be a false conclusion. Those gentlemen, among whom he was one, disapproved of the peace of Amiens, not because they preferred war to peace, but because they thought it deprived the country of the means of carrying on the war, which he thought must soon break out again. That opinion he had not since changed; and he was still more confirmed in it, from what had passed that day in the house.

Mr. Sheridan said, the right honourable gentleman (Mr. Windham) and the first consul of France, held the same language. Mr. Windham had said, that peace left the country in a situation incapable of renewing the war, and the first consul said so also. Mr. Sheridan added, "I certainly did not expect that the sentiments of the first consul of France would be re-echoed by a member of this house. But whatever sentiments both of them may entertain, with respect to the incapability of the country, I hope and trust, if unhappily war be unavoidable, that we shall convince that right honourable gentleman, and the first consul of France, that we have not incapacitated ourselves, by making peace, to renew the war with as much promptitude, vigour, and perseverance, as we have already evinced. I trust, sir, we shall succeed in convincing them that we are able to enter single-handed into war, notwithstanding the despondency of the right honourable gentleman, and the confident assertion of the first consul of France; and that we are justified in entertaining a well-founded hope, that we shall be able to convince, not only the right honourable member and the first consul of France, but all Europe, of our capability, even single-handed, to meet and triumph over the dangers, however great and imminent, which may threaten us from the renewal of hostilities."

After a considerable debate, the address was unanimously voted, and presented in the usual form to his majesty.

The chancellor of the exchequer then gave notice that he would, on the ensuing Friday, move for an addition of ten thousand seamen.

On the 10th of March, the chancellor of the exchequer brought down to the house of commons, the following message from his majesty:

"G. R.

"In consequence of the preparations carrying on in the ports of France and Holland, whilst important discussions are subsisting between his majesty and the French government, ment, his majesty thinks it due to the care and concern which he feels for his faithful people, to omit no means in his power, which may contribute to their security. In pursuance, therefore, of the acts of parliament enabling his majesty to call out and assemble the militia of the united kingdom, his majesty has thought it right to make this communication to the house of commons, to the end that his majesty may cause the said militia, or such part thereof as his majesty shall think necessary, to be forthwith drawn out and embodied, and to march as occasion shall require. G. R."

The king's message being read from the chair, the secretary at war rose to move the address usual on such occasions; which was agreed to nem. con. and ordered to be presented to his majesty.

On the following day, the house resolved itself into a committee of supply, when Mr. Garthshore moved, that ten thousand seamen be granted for the service of the navy, for twelve lunar months.

Mr. Francis said, that it was not his intention to oppose the motion; but he wished to express a hope that the number of seamen, now to be voted, would be found adequate to the purpose for which he conceived they were wanted; namely, to put the country in a posture of defence. He could not, however, look for any great success to the country, because the best abilities were not in the king's administration.

The chancellor of the exchequer denied (with the exception of himself) the want of ability in the persons conducting his majesty's government. The message of his majesty to parliament, had been the result of the most mature deliberation. It could not be expected, that, pending negociation and discussion, he should state the objects under consideration; the truth was, that if any amicable adjustment took place, concession must be made on the one side or the other. In stating this, he begged it might not be inferred, that there was any unbecoming spirit of concession on either hand; and his majesty's government had the heart-felt satisfaction of reflecting, that they in no degree, had compromised the honour of the country.

Mr. Dent was of opinion, that ten thousand seamen was too small a number on the present occasion; he therefore moved an amendment, that twenty-five thousand seamen be granted.

Mr. Fox declared, that he would support the original motion in preference to the amendment, not because he did not conceive the amendment to be proper, but because no information was afforded to the committee that ten thousand seamen, or indeed any express number, were more necessary. After a speech of considerable length, in which he made many excellent reflections on the subject under discussion, he concluded by saying, "If we cannot preserve our rank in the scale of the nations of Europe, but by war, then I call that war just and necessary. I am thoroughly convinced, that to obtain the consent of a nation to such a war, does not require, in the present posture of affairs, any stimulus: tell the people of Great Britain the truth, then shew their situation, expose the artifices by which they have been attempted to be deluded, and their confidence will be obtained. If they are misled, if they are kept in the dark, a war is entered upon with reluctance, and that public spirit which has so knit them together, falls to the ground."

At length, after a great deal of debate, in which lord Hawkesbury, Mr. Canning, sir William Pulteney, and Mr. French, severally supported the motion, it was put, and carried.

The sum of six hundred and three thousand and five hundred pounds was then voted for the ten thousand seamen, for twelve lunar months; two hundred and ninety thousand pounds for victuals: three hundred and thirty thousand pounds for wear and tear of the ships; and twenty-seven thousand pounds for ordnance.

In consequence of his majesty's message, the following note was delivered by M. de Talleyrand to lord Whitworth:

"1. If his Britannic majesty, in his message, means to speak of the expedition to Helvoetsluys, all the world knows that it was destined for America, and that it was on the point of sailing for its destination: but, in consequence of his majesty's message, the embarkation and putting to sea are about to be countermanded.

"2. If we did not receive satisfactory explanation respecting these armaments in England, and if they actually take place, it is natural that the first consul should march twenty thousand men into Holland, since Holland is mentioned in the message.

"3. These troops being once in the country, it is natural that an encampment should be formed on the frontiers of Hanover; and, moreover, that additional bodies should join those troops which were already embarked for America, in order to form new embarkations, and to maintain an offensive and defensive position.

"4. It is natural that the first consul should order several camps to be formed at Calais, and on different points of the coasts.

"5. It is likewise in the nature of things, that the first consul, who was on the point of evacuating Switzerland, should be under the necessity of continuing a French army in that country.

"6. It is also the natural consequence of all this, that the first consul should send a fresh force into Italy, in order to occupy, in case of necessity, the position of Tarentum.

"7. England arming, and arming with so much publicity, will compel France to put her armies on the war establishment; a step so important, as cannot fail to agitate all Europe."

The island of Malta appears to have been the point upon which the negociation terminated; a variety of notes were exchanged. The English government required that they should retain possession of the island for ten years, on account of the alteration which had taken place in the constitution of the order of St. John, since the treaty of Amiens; while the first consul insisted on the evacuation, but proposed that it should be garrisoned by one of the three powers, Russia, Austria, or Prussia. In reply to this proposition, lord Hawkesbury observed, that Russia was the only power to which England (if she were even so disposed) would resign Malta, but that Russia would not agree to such an arrangement (l).

(l) The following conversation between lord Whitworth and the first consul, on the 14th of March, 1803, is not uninteresting. At the court which was held at the Thuilleries on that day, the first consul accosted lord Whitworth with great agitation. He began by asking him—If he had any news from England? He told him, he had received letters from lord Hawkesbury, two days ago. Bonaparte immediately said, and so you are determined to go to war?—No, replied lord Whitworth, we are too sensible of the advantages of peace.—Nous avons, said he, déjà fait la guerre pendant quinze ans. We have already, said he, been fifteen years at war.—As he seemed to wait for an answer, lord Whitworth observed only, C'en est déjà trop.—That is already too much,—Mais, said he, vous voulez la faire encore quinze années. But, said he, you would continue it for another fifteen years. His lordship said, that was very far from his majesty's intentions. The first consul then proceeded to count Marcou and the chevalier Azara, who were standing together at a little distance from lord Whitworth, and said to them, Les Anglois veulent la guerre, mais s'ils les premier à tirer l'epée, je serai le dernier à la remettre. The English are desirous of a war, but if they are the first to draw the sword, I shall be the last to sheath it. He then went his round. In a few minutes, he came back to lord Whitworth, and resumed the conversation, by saying something personally civil to him. He began again.—Pourquoi des armamens? Contre qui des mesures de précaution? Je n'ai pas un seul vaisseau de ligne dans les ports de France; mais si vous voulez armer, j'armerai aussi. I have not a single ship of the line in the ports of France; but if you arm I shall follow your example. Vous pourrez peut etre tuer la France, mais jamais l'intimider. On ne voudroit, said his lordship, ni l'un ni l'autre. On voudroit vivre en bonne intelligence avec elle. Il faut dans respecter les traites, replied he: malheur à ceux qui ne respectens pas les traites; ils en serons responsable à tout l'Europe. Regard then should be paid to treaties, replied he; and misfortune attend those who are regardless of their treaties. For such a violation they are accountable to all Europe. The chief consul was too much agitated to render it adviseable for lord Whitworth to prolong the conversation; he therefore made no answer, and Bonaparte retired to his apartment, repeating the last phrase. All this conversation was loud enough to be heard by about two hundred people who were present: and it was supposed that there was not a single person, who did not feel the extreme impropriety of the first consul's conduct.

Lord Whitworth called on M. de Talleyrand to converse with him on what had passed at the Thuilleries, between Bonaparte and his lordship on Sunday the 14th of March: He said he went to the Thuilleries to pay his respects to the first consul, and to present his countrymen, and not to treat of political subjects; and that unless he had the assurance from him, that he should not be exposed to a repetition of the same disagreeable circumstances, he should be under the necessity of discontinuing his visits to the Thuilleries. M. de Talleyrand assured his lordship that it was very far from the first consul's intention to distress his lordship; but he had felt himself personally insulted by the charges which were brought against him by the English government; and that it was incumbent on him to take the first opportunity of exculpating himself in the presence of the ministers of the different powers of Europe. He assured him, however, that nothing similar should occur.

His majesty, hearing of this behaviour of the chief consul, signified by lord Hawkesbury, that he had a right to expect, that his ambassador should be treated with the respect and attention due to the dignity of the sovereign whom he represents; and that it would be impossible for lord Whitworth to present himself on any days of ceremony to the first consul, unless he receives an assurance that he shall never be exposed to a repetition of the treatment which he experienced on that occasion.

Concerning

Concerning the restrictions wished to be imposed on the liberty of the press in this country, the following extract from a note, presented by general Andreossi, will sufficiently explain the desires of the French government on that head. The chief consul has had cause to be convinced, that all his representations on these points were useless, and that his Britannic majesty, regardless of the neighbouring powers, was resolved to authorize every thing within his dominions; but he did not, on that account, entertain a doubt of the continuance of peace, nor alarm Europe with the notification of war. He confined himself to this principle of conduct, to permit or prevent in France with respect to England, whatever should be permitted or prevented in England with regard to France. He has, however, expressed, and again expressed it, a wish that means should be adopted to prevent in future any mention being made of what is passing in France, either in the official discussions, or in the polemical writings in England, as in like manner in the French official discussions, and polemical writings, no mention whatever should be made of what is passing in England.

In a conversation which took place between M. Talleyrand and lord Whitworth, the former mentioned the calamities which would follow the failure of our endeavour to avoid a rupture. He insisted that Holland, Naples, and other countries connected with Great Britain, would be the first victims of the war. Lord Whitworth asked him, whether he thought such a conduct would add to the glory of the first consul, or whether an attack on the innocent and defenceless would not rather tarnish it, and ultimately unite against him not only the honest men in his own country, but every government in Europe. That it certainly would excite more detestation than terror in England; at the same time that it would serve to impress upon them still more strongly, the necessity of omitting no means of circumscribing a power so perniciously exerted. His lordship added, that no act of hostility had actually taken place, yet the inveteracy with which our commerce, our industry, and our credit, had been attacked in every part to which French influence could be extended, it would bear the same construction; as it tended to prove, in addition to the general system of the first consul, that his object was to pursue, under the mask of peace, the same line of conduct in which the preceding governments had acted.

On the 29th of April a person, supposed to have been employed by the first consul, waited on lord Whitworth, for the purpose of ascertaining his sentiments: he informed his lordship, that, in the course of the day, he would receive a letter from M. de Talleyrand, drawn up under the inspection of the first consul, which, though not exactly what his lordship might wish, was so moderate as to afford him a well-grounded hope, and might certainly be sufficient to induce him to delay, for a short time, his departure. Lord Whitworth assured him that it would afford him great satisfaction to perceive a probability of bringing the negociation to a favourable issue; and that he should be extremely sorry to impede the business by any useless precipitation. His lordship added, that he acted in conformity to instructions, and that those instructions were positive; and that by them he was enjoined to leave Paris on the following Tuesday, unless certain conditions were agreed to in the intermediate time.

Lord Whitworth, however, received no letter in the course of that day; therefore he went about four o'clock to M. de Talleyrand, and expressed great anxiety to learn whether he had any thing favourable to communicate: if he had not, his lordship begged him to recollect that Tuesday was the day on which he must leave Paris; and also requested that he would have the necessary passports prepared for him and his family. Talleyrand appeared evidently embarrassed, and, after some hesitation, observed, that he could not suppose he should really go away; but that at all events the first consul never would recal his ambassador. To this lord Whitworth replied, his majesty recalled me, in order to put an end to the negociation, on the principle that even actual war was preferable to the state of suspence in which England, and indeed all Europe, had been kept for so long a period.

After this lord Whitworth relates a number of shifts and expedients which were put in practice by the French minister to gain time. He afterwards found it extremely difficult to find Talleyrand; and when he did get a sight of him, the old arguments were repeated on both sides. Talleyrand talked of a contre-projet: lord Whitworth said he could not attend to it, his orders being peremptory. Talleyrand said it should be given him, when he might either accept it, send it to London, or leave Paris. Lord Whitworth waited some time in expectation of it, but it did not arrive; he therefore demanded his passports by an official note which he sent to Mr. Mandeville: after experiencing some delay, he renewed his demand of passports; which he obtained, and prepared to leave France.

The following is the projet sent by lord Hawkesbury in his last dispatch, and on which lord Whitworth and Talleyrand had their last conference.

"I. The French government shall engage to make no opposition to the cession of the island of Lampedosa to his majesty the king of the Two Sicilies.

"II. In consequence of the present state of the island of Lampedosa, his majesty shall remain in possession of the island of Malta, until such arrangements shall be made by him, as may enable his majesty to occupy Lampedosa as a naval station; after which period the island of Malta shall be given up to the inhabitants, and acknowledged as an independent state.

"III. The territories of the Batavian republic shall be evacuated by the French forces, within one month after the conclusion of a convention founded on the principles of this projet.

"IV. The king of Etruria, and the Italian and Ligurian republics, shall be acknowledged by his majesty.

"V. Switzerland shall be evacuated by the French forces.

"VI. A suitable territorial provision shall be assigned to the king of Sardinia in Italy.

"Secret Article. His majesty shall not be required by the French government to evacuate the island of Malta, until after the expiration of ten years.

Articles IV. V. VI. may be entirely omitted, or must all be inserted.

Another inclosure contains a letter from lord Whitworth to Talleyrand, informing him that he could not find him, and therefore, as he must leave Paris within a limited time, he would leave the projet of a convention with his secretary Mr. Talbot.

Lord Whitworth set out from Paris on the 12th of May, and arrived in London at eleven o'clock at night on the 18th. It was at one o'clock on the morning of the 9th, that lord Whitworth received dispatches transmitted by Silvester, the messenger, but in consequence of an accident which had happened to the first consul, he deferred delivering in the final determination of his government till noon on the 10th. A decisive answer was at the same time demanded by the ambassador in the course of thirty-six hours; and if the proposal was rejected, he expressly informed the minister for foreign affairs, that he had orders to quit Paris at the expiration of that time. An answer was soon after sent to lord Whitworth, that the first consul intended to submit to his council of state, the decision of the question of war or peace. The council was accordingly assembled; and notwithstanding the opposition both of Joseph Bonaparte and Talleyrand, the issue of their deliberations was the renewal of hostilities.

Constituted as this council is, no other result could be reasonably expected. It does not appear that either the senate or the legislative body were in any respect consulted; and no other advice was asked than that which was previously known to accord with Bonaparte's avowed opinion. The council was occupied in the consideration of the question, till the afternoon of the 12th. The expedient of referring the points in dispute to the decision of the council of state, was a subterfuge calculated for giving another day's delay, and taking off, as much as possible from the first consul, the odium of involving the people of France in a war. Lord Whitworth quitted Paris three hours after the opinion of those counsellors was communicated to him.

The crisis being now arrived, lord Pelham brought down on the 16th of May, the following message from his majesty (m):

"G. R.

(m) On the same day, his majesty issued his royal proclamation, at a court held at the queen's palace, present the king's most excellent majesty in council, in the following words:

"Whereas, in consequence of the repeated insults and provocations which his majesty has experienced from the government of France, his majesty finds himself compelled to take such measures as are necessary for vindicating the honour of his crown, and the just rights of his subjects; his majesty therefore is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy

"G. R.

"His majesty thinks proper to acquaint the house of lords, that the discussions which his majesty announced on the 8th of March, as then subsisting between his majesty and the French government, have terminated. The conduct of the French government has obliged his majesty to recal his ambassador from Paris; and the ambassador from the French republic has left London. His majesty has given directions for laying before the house of lords, with as little delay as possible, copies of such papers as may be proper for the information of parliament on this important subject. It is a consolation to his majesty to reflect that no endeavour has been wanting on his part to preserve the blessings of peace; but, under the circumstances which have occurred to disappoint his just expectations, his majesty relies with perfect confidence on the zeal and public spirit of the house of lords, and upon the exertions of his brave and loyal subjects, to support his determination to employ the power and resources of the country, in opposing the spirit of ambition and encroachment, which now actuates the conduct of the French government, in upholding the dignity of the crown, and in asserting and maintaining the rights and essential interests of his people."

The message having been read by the lord chancellor, lord Pelham stated, that what their lordships had just heard read, would be followed by the communication of the papers which it alluded to, without the least possible delay. Their lordships would no doubt be anxious to give them the fullest examination, before they should be called upon to determine on the subject of the message itself; and as there certainly could not be sufficient time to enable them to accomplish that object before the beginning of next week, he would move that his majesty's message should be taken into consideration on that day sennight.

Lord Stanhope said, he agreed with the language of the message, as to the importance of the subject, which was now submitted to them. War, was at all times, a subject of the most serious importance. War, the evils of which might be summed up in the quotation used by a right reverend prelate then in the house: "Before it is as a garden of Eden, and behind it is as a desolate Wilderness," was pregnant with more than ordinary evils to a country like this, which had almost exhausted its strength and its finances in a recent contest. He expressed a desire of some delay, to receive information from the perusal of the papers alluded to, and to deliberate maturely on the situation of the country.

The motion was then carried unanimously, and the house adjourned.

The order of the day for taking into consideration his majesty's message on the 25th of May, being read, lord Pelham said that it was perhaps unnecessary to remark upon the extreme importance of the occasion upon which he rose. The question of peace or war was at all times important, but connected with the circumstances under which it was now presented to their consideration, it challenged more than ordinary attention. The documents on which their lordships' decision was required, had been for some days before the house, and to them alone did he wish them at present to direct their enquiries; fully acquiescing in the line of proceeding suggested the other day, of reserving the examination of the conduct of ministry for a separate occasion. His lordship took a retrospective view of the circumstances as they occurred since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, and then concluded with moving an address.

Lord Stanhope, after declaring the address to be founded on a mistake, said he should be doing violence to his conscience, were he to vote in support of it.

The duke of Cumberland gave his cordial assent to the address.

The duke of Clarence stated the grounds on which he had supported the peace of Amiens, though it did not stipulate for two of the objects which he had most at heart. The cession of Malta to this country, and the restoration of the king of Sardinia. Notwithstanding this disappointment, he considered the treaty, on the whole, as both honourable and advantageous; and as such, had the French government manifested the same sincerity with his majesty's ministers for carrying it into effect, in its spirit as well as its letter, might long have preserved the blessings of peace to both countries. His royal highness here took occasion to detail the various points of contrast in the conduct of the French and British governments, contending, as the general result, that in no respect was the latter chargeable with a breach of good faith. He trusted, that the issue of the present contest would so chastise the insolence of the rulers of France, that they would not only retract their boast, that England could not fight France single-handed, but feel convinced, that with respect to the foreign possessions of them and their vassal states of Spain and Holland, we had it amply in our power to retort upon them the same language and conduct, which they adopted with respect to us, in regard to our intercourse with the continent.

Lord Mulgrave, with a minuteness of detail, which will not permit us to follow in its full extent, expatiated on the series of insults and provocations which we had received from the French government ever since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens. In the remonstrances which had been made relative to Switzerland, Holland, Malta, and the various other topics of complaint on our part, he conceived that ministers had exhausted every means of conciliation, before they made an appeal to the decision of the sword. On these grounds he found himself bound by his duty to his sovereign, his country, and his conscience to concur in the address.

Lord Melville observed, that it had not been contended by any noble lord, that Egypt was not essential to the interests of this country, in whatever light it might be viewed. That point being admitted, no noble lord in any manner argued, or even so much as attempted to argue, that Malta was not equally essential to the preservation of possessions in the east, as affording a key to Egypt. With respect to that island, no guarantee for it had been found, as was stipulated by the treaty of Amiens. Would it be proper to have recourse to Prussia, Spain, or Austria, as guarantees?—No. The first is by local situation incapable of such a trust: the second is under the controul of France; and the third, in the present situation of affairs, cannot interfere with any effect. Malta, therefore, could only be guaranteed by Great Britain and Russia united; but it would appear from the feeble manifestation of that power, that by a British garrison alone this point could be attained. After a great number of observations on this important topic, his lordship concluded by declaring, that this country, privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that general reprisals be granted against the ships, goods, and subjects of the French republic, so that as well as his majesty's fleets and ships, as also all other ships and vessels that shall be commissioned by letters of marque, or general reprisals, or otherwise, by his majesty's commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral of Great Britain, shall and may lawfully seize all ships, vessels, and goods belonging to the French republic, or to any persons being subjects of the French republic, or inhabiting within any of the territories of the French republic, and bring the same to judgement in such courts of admiralty within his majesty's dominions, as shall be duly commissioned to take cognizance thereof; and, to that end, his majesty's advocate general, with the advocate of the admiralty, are forthwith to prepare a draft of a commission, and present the same to his majesty at his board, authorizing the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral, or any person or persons by them empowered and appointed, to issue forth and grant letters of marque and reprisals to any of his majesty's subjects, or others whom the said commissioners shall deem fitly qualified in that behalf, for the apprehending, seizing, and taking, the ships, vessels, and goods belonging to the French republic, or to any persons being subjects of the French republic, or inhabiting within any of the territories of the French republic: and that such powers and clauses be inserted in the said commissions, as have been usual, and are according to former precedents; and his majesty's said advocate general, with the advocate of the admiralty, are also forthwith to prepare the draft of a commission, and to present the same to his majesty at his board, authorising the said commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral, to will and require the high court of admiralty of Great Britain, and the lieutenant and judge of the said court, his surrogate, or surrogates, as also the several courts of admiralty within his majesty's dominions which shall be duly commissioned to take cognizance of, and judicially proceed upon all, and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships and goods that are or shall be made; and to hear and determine the same, and according to the courts of admiralty and the laws of nations, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods, as shall belong to the French republic, or to any persons being subjects of the French republic; or inhabiting within any of the territories of the French republic; and that such powers and clauses be inserted in the said commission as have been usual, and are according to former precedents; and they are likewise to prepare and lay before his majesty at his board, a draft of such instructions as may be proper to be sent to the said several courts of admiralty, in his majesty's foreign governments and plantations, for their guidance herein; as also another draft of instructions for such ships as shall be commissioned for the purposes above-mentioned." [Here follows the signatures of thirty-one members of the privy council.]

Three other proclamations were also issued; the first, offering bounties to seamen; the second, recalling British seamen from foreign service; and the third, prohibiting the British ships from entering the ports of the French and Batavian republics, and also ordering an embargo on French and Batavian ships in British ports.

in his opinion, was to retain and keep Malta in perpetuity as its guarantee, and upon that ground he would cordially support the motion for an address to his majesty.

The duke of Richmond took a view of the conduct of administration, and contended, notwithstanding their high language now, that, some time ago, they would have given up Malta, and taken in exchange the island of Lampedosa.

The marquis of Lansdown argued on several particulars, which had been stated by the noble peers. With respect to Switzerland, surely Austria could not interfere: neither could it be presumed, that Austria would interfere in the annexation of Parma and Placentia to the French power. Even the report of Sebastiani was not a legitimate cause of war, because there was no state in Europe which did not employ spies and emissaries to collect information upon every subject.

The duke of Norfolk said, that he approved of the peace which had been concluded by the treaty of Amiens, and hoped some means might be devised by which it might be preserved.

Lord King concluded a speech of considerable length, by moving an amendment to the original motion, for an address to the following effect:—"To assure his majesty of the co-operation of the house in the vigorous prosecution of the war; but at the same time to assure his majesty, that the house was anxious to support him in any arrangement which might be entered into, for bringing the present dispute to an amicable termination, &c."

Lord Ellenborough opposed the amendment.

In the further progress of the debate, the original address was supported by lord Moira, lord Rosslyn, the marquis of Sligo, and lord Grenville, and the amendment by the duke of Norfolk, lord Darnley, and lord Gwydir. The house having been divided on the amendment, it was lost by a majority of one hundred and forty-two to ten. After which the original address was carried.

Such was the opinion of the house of lords with respect to the important subject of discussion; and the lower house manifested a similar disposition. On the 24th of May, lord Hawkesbury brought up to the house, several papers connected with the late negociation, which had been prepared in consequence of lord Whitworth's return. He then moved the order of the day for the house resuming the debate on his majesty's message.

The speaker stated, that an address had been moved to his majesty, which he read. This was merely an echo of the message. To this address an amendment had been moved, assuring his majesty that the house was anxious to support him in any arrangement, which might be entered into for bringing the present dispute to an amicable adjustment.

After some prefatory observations, Mr. Thomas Grenville said, he should proceed to consider the argument, whether the country has a just cause of war? Dependent on this question was another, namely, whether having a just cause of war, there may not be a proper degree of expediency in pursuing it.—With regard to the first of these points, he had no hesitation in saying, that every act of the French government, since the definitive treaty, had been to degrade, vilify, and abuse England, while the French nation was exalted and praised. In considering of the question, therefore, whether we had a just cause of war, his difficulty was in culling the most prominent from the mass, as he could not lay his finger on one, without touching another, so bloated and deformed was the scandalous catalogue of French insult and aggression. If he were to take the first mentioned in the declaration (n), he would say, that the act of sending men into this country, disguised as commercial agents, but who were in fact military spies, who were received with that generous hospitality which ever characterises Britons, that mere act he would pronounce to be a cause for war; nay, more, it was so scandalous and detestable a breach of faith, as must stamp infamy eternal on its authors. He did not mean to trouble the house, on the point respecting the annexation of the dominions of the king of Sardinia to France, but this he would also pronounce another sufficient cause of war. At length, after a very long and animated speech, which breathed nothing but war, he concluded by saying, if the country be unanimous, and the parliament true to the country, in taking care the supplies be properly administered, and wisely employed, we shall come out of the contest with glory to ourselves, honour to the nation, safety to our people, and confer lasting and permanent benefits on posterity.

Mr. Whitbread supported the amendment with great ability.

Mr. Canning expressed his astonishment that any doubt could remain in the mind of any man, as to the justice of our quarrel, after perusing the mass of evidence contained in the papers on the table. He then touched on the most prominent points of the correspondence, to prove that the aggression was clearly on the side of France.

Mr. Dallas spoke against the amendment.

Mr. Fox went over the different points of complaint at considerable length, and contended, that upon none of them had he brought the discussion with France to that clear unequivocal issue, which would constitute a legitimate cause of war. If France, said he, had unjustly seized and confiscated British vessels, satisfaction ought to have been demanded in a firm and decided tone; and if that was refused, there would have been an undoubted act of aggression on the part of France. There was no nation more exposed to complaint, for restraints on the commerce of other countries, than Great Britain. Alarming as the extended dominion of France was to this country, and the continental powers, if we took into the comparison all our acquisitions in India, it would be found that, as between us and France, the charge of aggrandizement applied to this country. But when this view of the question was taken, ministers seemed to imitate the conduct of those ladies, who, on their return from India were accused of some irregularities, and whose answer always was, "Never, upon my honour, on this side the Cape of Good Hope." He thought Malta ought to be placed under the protection of Russia, which, it appears, was disposed to accept the guarantee under certain modifications. He begged the house to pause before they plunged the country into all the horrors of war, and to recollect the situation it was in during the last five years of the preceding war. They were told, not by a novice, but a very distinguished artist, that the dangers they were then exposed to, and the burdens they then had borne, were nothing, compared to what now awaited them. As they had then paid a tenth, they would now be compelled to pay a fifth, or a third of their income. He would vote for the amendment, because, while it pledged the house to the support of his majesty, it manifested an anxiety for the speediest possible restoration of peace. Mr. Fox said, that when we concluded the treaty of Amiens, we were aware that Europe was far from being in a comfortable state, we had, however, acquiesced in that imperfect security. This was the condition of man in society. If we had always aimed at substantial and absolute security, we should have had nothing but unremitted war for the last century. The situation of Italy we knew at the time of our signing the definitive treaty. As to Piedmont, it was a mere difference of name, and it was a matter of complete insignificance whether it was called the 27th military division, or the department of the Po. Adverting to the situation of Holland, filled with French troops, and to the late revolution of Switzerland, he argued, that our ministers, from all that had appeared, had never properly remonstrated on those important points, and had therefore no right to make them a part of his majesty's declaration. If we had remonstrated, it is at least probable that redress might have been obtained. If it were contended, that every aggrandizement on the part of France should be a cause of jealousy on our part, this, in his opinion, would be pushing the principle too far. Every improvement in the interior of France, might in that case be considered as offensive, and war between the two countries might be regarded as eternal. The affairs of Holland and Switzerland seemed, however, to be inferred in the declaration, only to avoid the perpetual repetition of "the First Consul," and "Malta;" and this was pretty evident from our omitting all mention of the Swiss in our ultimatum. The treatment of the Dutch by France could not be too strongly condemned; but our ministers, who did not

(n) His majesty had issued a declaration, written in a temperate yet firm and dignified style, clearly manifesting the great moderation and forbearance of the British government, under a continued system of aggression and menace, with which the French have insulted this country. The declaration of his majesty is such as becomes a great nation, whose faith and dignity it most ably justifies. It is a simple narrative of recorded facts that convinces the understanding, without any delusive aid, drawn from argument or abstract reading. In the negociation itself, we find the sophistry of the chief consul miserably opposed to the plain dealing of an English plenipotentiary; demonstrating through the whole little more than the weakness of his own judgement, and the irritability of a coarse ungovernable disposition. Even in his affectation to deprecate a rupture with England, he had not the ordinary policy to disguise, that warfare with her was predetermined in his mind.

not remonstrate, had no right to complain. It formed nearly as black a stain, however, in the conduct of the French government, as their proceedings with regard to St. Domingo. The idea of re-establishing the French government in that island, was as absurd and ruinous, as its conduct to Toussaint had been false and treacherous. In all these proceedings, in the affair of the German indemnities, in the occupation of Parma and Placentia, he saw no legitimate cause of quarrel on the part of England, and particularly as our ministers had failed to remonstrate at the proper season. With respect to the attack made by the consular government on the liberty of the press in this country, it betrayed only gross ignorance of the forms and essence of our constitution: and if their demands had been resisted in a manly way, it would never, in his opinion, have furnished a ground for dispute. The reciprocal abuse, and mutual irritation, arising from this source, were certainly matters of regret; but no person could say that they offered a ground for war. He did not profess to entertain much respect for the members of the Bourbon family, but if it was insisted peremptorily that one of them was to be sent out of the kingdom, he should refuse it on the point of honour, though at the expence of a war. This, however, had not been demanded. Much reliance had been placed on the language of the exposé, "That England could no longer contend single-handed with France." This was an impertinent phrase, but, as was usual in society, it should either have been noticed at the time, or consigned to utter contempt. With respect to the report of Sebastiani, of which so much has been said, it was in many respects highly indecorous. The attack upon general Stuart was indecent, but, from every thing he had heard, the character of that officer stood too high to be affected by so pitiable a calumny. He regretted that so much had been said of the verbal intercourse between lord Whitworth and Bonaparte. Conversations of such a kind were subject to different representations, but all that could be inferred from them was this, that lord Whitworth should not have gone again to the palace of the Thuilleries till the matter was properly explained.

Mr. Addington in reply said, he was sorry that any thing should fall from his great and exalted talents, which had for its tendency to unnerve and unhinge the public mind under the present circumstances. It was to hold forth hope and encouragement to a rival nation, which should rather be impressed with a deep conviction of guilty designs. The speech, which the house had just heard, seemed calculated to invite individuals to weigh their private inconveniences against their public duty. The address had not been so constructed as to cover ministers, who did not desire to shrink from any enquiry whatever. It was meant to embrace all opinions, and to produce that unanimity so important and so essential upon the present occasion. In proof of the hostile designs of the French government, he stated that the expences of the army which had been reduced to two hundred and ten millions of livres, amounted in March last, when his majesty's message was delivered, to two hundred and forty millions; and those of the navy had arisen in a like proportion, namely, from one hundred and five, to one hundred and twenty-six millions. The papers on the table, he contended, were sufficient to convince every thinking man in the country of the propriety of the conduct pursued by ministers. Had they acted otherwise, they would have betrayed their trust, and gone into a new war with diminished advantages. They had not insisted upon Malta; on the contrary, they had offered in their last project, to accept of any other equivalent security; but this was refused. Under such circumstances, it became absolutely necessary, to put forth this strength of the nation. He, for himself and his colleagues, exhibited a general disclaimer to that sort of coverture which was supposed to be conveyed in the address, and therefore he hoped, it would have the general, if not the unanimous, concurrence of the house.

The Attorney General did not wish to intrude on the time of the house, otherwise he had materials before him that would convince them of the immediate necessity of commencing a war against a powerful and dangerous enemy.

Mr. Windham considered it a perfectly just war; and that a peace, under the present situation of affairs, would be dangerous to the country. The house of commons, he considered like an assembly of surgeons, convened to execute a great but delicate operation; and he would ask, whether it would not be better to give the patient a little pain, than let him perish by false kindness? This was the exact state of the country at the present moment: we must suffer pain to save our country from becoming a heap of ruins. He should therefore support the original question. The house divided on the amendment. Ayes, sixty-seven; Noes, three hundred and ninety-eight. Majority in favour of the address, three hundred and thirty-one.

On the 27th of May, a debate occurred in the house of commons respecting the mediation of Russia. Mr. Fox in detailing the advantages that would result from the mediation of Russia, contended that she was equally inclined to promote an adjustment of differences, and capable of making both powers abide by her decision. After taking an enlarged view of the question, he submitted the following motion to the house: "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to avail himself of the disposition manifested by his imperial majesty the emperor of Russia, to offer his mediation between his majesty and the republic of France, as a means of terminating the war in which we are engaged, in a manner consistent with the honour of his majesty's crown, and with a view to the general tranquillity of Europe."

Lord Hawkesbury was equally ready to agree that Russia was the power, which of all others the country should endeavour to conciliate, as affording the best hopes of arresting the progress of French ambition. He must candidly admit, that one circumstance weighed particularly on his mind with respect to the conclusion of the last peace, which was, that of forming a barrier to the aggrandizement of France. From the signing of the treaty to the present time, no efforts have been wanting on the part of his majesty's government to form a close connection with Russia, having for its basis no hostility towards any power, and, having only in view the necessary measures of defence. Those efforts have, however, failed; otherwise it is highly probable, that the present crisis would not have arisen. He assured the house, that during the whole of the negociation, his majesty's ministers used every opportunity of expressing to the court of Petersburgh their desire of preserving peace; but no measure was proposed by that court, however good its intentions, that did not seem calculated to add to that procrastination of which the French were so desirous. With regard to the supposed offer of mediation, he had to say, that after a long negociation, after a frank and full expression of his majesty's sentiments, after numberless evasions on the part of France, the only proposition made in the end was, that the two powers might avail themselves of any explanation that could be afforded by his imperial majesty.

Mr. Pitt declared, that if any judicious arrangements could be made, so as to constitute Russia a guarantee of the peace of Europe, it could never enter into any statesman's head to reject it, but at present, there were no grounds for a hope of this nature. There was nothing on which the motion could be fairly founded; it was best, therefore, to leave the course of conduct to the executive government.

Mr. Fox explained; but lord Hawkesbury having assured the house that the mediation of Russia would be joyfully accepted, and any proposals she might make listened to, if consonant with the dignity of Great Britain, Mr. Fox withdrew his motion without pressing for a division (o).

We

(o) On the renewal of hostilities, Bonaparte dispatched the following message to the Senate, the Legislative Body, and the Tribunate.

"St. Cloud, May 20.—The English ambassador has been recalled: forced by this circumstance, the ambassador of the republic has quitted a country where he could no longer hear the words of peace. In this decisive moment, the government places before your eyes, it will place before the eyes of France and of Europe, its first relations with the British ministry; new discussions, which seem to end with an absolute rupture. The present age and posterity will see all that it has done to put an end to the calamities of war; with what moderation, with what patience it has laboured to prevent its return. Nothing could interrupt the course of the projects formed to rekindle discord between the two nations. The treaty of Amiens was negociated in the midst of the clamours of a party hostile to peace. Hardly concluded, it became an object of severe censure; it was represented as fatal to England, because it was disgraceful to France. Speedily inquietudes were spread, dangers were pretended, on which the necessity of such a state of peace was established, which served as a permanent signal for new hostilities. Those wicked wretches were kept in reserve, and paid, who had torn in pieces the bosom of their country, and were destined to tear it again. Vain calculations of hatred! It is no longer that France divided by factions, and agitated by storms; it is France restored to internal tranquillity, regenerated in its administration and its laws, ready to fall with all its might upon any foreigner who shall dare to attack it, and to connect himself with those brigands, whom

We are far from being surprized that Mr. Fox should hastily withdraw his motion. Who could ever entertain the slightest hopes of success from a mediation on the part of Russia? Instead of taking a bold and magnanimous part, Russia had uniformly stood aloof to see the important blow atchieved; to see whether Bonaparte will be able to effect his landing in Britain, or experience shame, defeat, and ruin on her shores. To solicit the mediation of Russia, to adjust the differences, seemed a very impolitic step; though France was said to be desirous of the reference, and the emperor not averse to it. We are sensible of the influence of such an empire, who, in such a crisis, held the balance of power in her hands, and could direct its preponderance at her pleasure. If ministers were determined to adhere to the ultimatum, the idea of a mediation was absurd and contradictory: besides it might be highly impolitic in England to conform to a decision on subjects, which, from their peculiar nature, no arbitration of Russia could adjust. If France desired such a reference, she certainly had her inducements to suppose that England would be awarded to abate somewhat of her demands; and, should this great northern empire have ratified the claims of her government, France would have appealed from the award. On the other hand, had she pronounced those claims unreasonable, England would have been equally dissatisfied.

Had the mediation been confined to the question of Malta, it could be of no durable service. Whether Malta belong to England or France is a matter of small importance, when it is considered that the object of the contest is the independence of Europe, and not the guarantee of a rock. If the emperor should have awarded us Malta, which is certainly a very doubtful point, this would not have prevented a speedy renewal of the war; it would have been to close up a single wound, and leave a thousand open.

In a private interview with lord Whitworth at the Thuilleries, Bonaparte acknowledged, as we have more particularly shewn, his unwillingness to risk his life and reputation in such a hazardous enterprize, as the invasion of England, unless forced to it by necessity, and expressed his apprehension that if such an expedient should be adopted, that himself, and the greatest part of the expedition would go to the bottom of the sea. He modestly concluded his harangue, by asserting, "that there were one hundred chances to one against him." But it must be admitted that Bonaparte in condescending to speak thus rationally to the British ambassador, descended from the pinnacle of mystical sublimity, and in this single instance conducted himself like a mere man, though he was then almost an emperor.

With respect to our naval department for carrying on the war, sir Edward Pellew said, "from the debate of this night, there is one piece of information I have acquired, that the French have got upwards of a thousand vessels at Boulogne. I am glad to find that they are shut up there: we have one advantage in it, we know where they are; but I wish we had any means of knowing when they come out. I do not really see," continues the admiral, "in the arrangement of our naval defence, any thing to excite the apprehensions of even the most timid among us; on the contrary, I see every thing that may be expected from activity and perseverance, to inspire us with confidence. I see a triple naval bulwark, composed of one fleet acting on the enemy's coast; another consisting of heavier ships stationed in the Downs, ready to act at a moment's notice; and a third close to the beach, capable of destroying any part of the enemy's flotilla, that should escape the vigilance of the other two branches of our defence."

And sir James Pulteney, (in the same debate) after recapitulating the statements of sir Edward Pellew, respecting the strength and efficiency of our naval force, contended, "that we were able to block up the enemy in their ports, and to deride the menaces of invasion?"

CHAP. V.

AT length the die is cast, and war is declared by both nations. On the 22nd of May, 1803, ten days after the departure of lord Whitworth from Paris, appeared a decree, of which the following contains the particulars:

"Art. I. Ordered, that every commander of the squadrons, or naval divisions of the republic, captains of the ships of war, do bear down upon those of the king of England, as well as upon all vessels belonging to his subjects, to attack, take, and bring them into the harbours of the republic.

"II. Commissions shall be delivered in course, to such of the French privateers as shall demand them, and who shall obtain them, on condition of conforming for the said armaments, in course to the laws and rules now existing, or which may hereafter be made.

"III. All the English enrolled in the militia between the age of eighteen and sixty, or who hold commissions from his Britannic majesty, now in France, shall be immediately constituted prisoners of war, to answer for the citizens of the republic, who may have been detained, or made prisoners, by the vessels or subjects of his Britannic majesty, before the declaration of war.

"IV. The ministers are charged, each of whom it may concern, with the execution of this order, which shall be inserted in the bulletin des Loix.

(Signed) "BONAPARTE, First Consul.

By order of the First Consul,

"H. B. MARET, Secretary of State."

The king of England's declaration of war against the French republic appeared also about this time; and as it is couched in firm and masterly language, though we do not conceive that the matters mentioned therein, and so plausibly and positively asserted, were of sufficient weight to force the nation into a war, yet it would be deemed a glaring omission were we not to insert the principal parts of it (p).

As

whom an atrocious policy shall vomit again upon its soil to organize pillage and assassination. At length an unexpected message alarmed all England with imaginary armaments in France and Batavia, which assumed that important discussions divided the two governments, while no such discussion was known to the French government. Forthwith formidable armaments appeared on the coasts and in the ports of Great Britain; the sea is covered with ships of war, and it is in the midst of this preparation that the cabinet of London demands of France the abrogation of a fundamental article of the treaty of Amiens. They want, they say, new guarantees, and they forget the sacredness of treaties, the execution of which is the first of guarantees that nations can give to each other. France has in vain invoked plighted faith; in vain has she consented to shut her eyes upon the actual inexecution of the article of the treaty of Amiens, which England pretends to free herself from; in vain has she wished to delay taking a definitive part till the moment that Spain and Batavia, the other two contracting parties, had manifested their will; and, lastly, in vain has she proposed to call in the mediation of the powers who had been requested to guarantee, and who have, in effect, guaranteed the stipulations, the abrogation of which has been demanded. All these propositions have been rejected, and the demands of England are become more imperious and more absolute. It was not in the principles of government to bend under the menace; it was not in its power to bow the majesty of the French people under laws which were prescribed to it with forms so haughty and so new. If he had done it, it would have consecrated to England the right to annul, by its sole will, all the stipulations by which it was bound toward France. It would have authorised her to exact from France new guarantees at the least alarm which she might feign; and from thence two new principles would be placed in the public law of Great Britain, by the side of that by which she has cut off other nations from the sovereignty of the seas, and subjected to her laws and regulations the independence of their flags. The government confined itself within the line which principle and duty traced out of it. The negociations are interrupted, and we are ready to fight if we are attacked. At least we shall fight to maintain the faith of treaties, and for the honour of the French name. If we had given way to a vain terror, we should soon have had to fight to repel new pretensions, but we should have fought dishonoured by this first instance of our weakness, degraded in our own eyes, and lowered in the eyes of an enemy who would on some future occasion have made us to sink under their unjust pretensions. The nation will rest confident in the sentiment of its strength, whatever wounds the enemy may inflict in parts where we can neither prevent them nor reach them. The result of this contest will be such as we have a right to expect from the justice of our cause, and from the courage of our warriors.

BONAPARTE, First Consul.
H. B. MARET, Secretary of State."

Several speeches occurred on this MESSAGE in the Legislative Body on the 20th; but they did not, in the smallest degree, resemble an English debate; the speakers being all of one opinion, and attributing the rupture entirely to the bad faith, jealousy, and ambition of the English nation.

(p) We shall, therefore, by reason of its length, give an abstract of it by way of a note; and we insert it the more readily, because the war which followed it has now (January 1813,) continued nearly ten years, and there does not appear to be any solid reason for supposing that its flames will be speedily extinguished.

"His majesty's earnest endeavours for the preservation of peace having failed of success, he entertains the fullest confidence that he shall receive the same support from his parliament, and that the same zeal and spirit will be manifested by his people, which he has experienced on every occasion when the honour of his crown has been attacked, or the essential interests of his dominions have been endangered. As soon as the treaty of Amiens was concluded, his majesty's courts were open to the people of France for every purpose of legal redress; all sequestrations were taken off their property; all prohibitions on their trade, which had been

As it is not our intention to animadvert on the terms of his majesty's declaration of war, which has been said to be unanswerable, though it appears to us that every part of it might be answered with the greatest facility, we must remark, that it drew forth from the first consul and his cabinet the following observations, which were inserted in the Moniteur, the government gazette of France:

STATE PAPER.

Paris, May 26, 1803.

"The declaration of the king of England has just appeared. It is accompanied with a volume of papers of one hundred and forty-five folio pages. This volume contains seventy-two articles, among which ten only are official, and even of these many are insignificant. Sixty-two are extracts of letters from the ministers to their agents, and from English agents to their cabinets, letters which have doubtless been fabricated by the chancellerie (q), to suit the convenience of ministers. Those notes which are the most important, and the most proper for shewing to the English people the proceeding of the French government, and the true spirit of the negociation, have been carefully suppressed; and what appears the last degree of shamelessness, and even of folly, is, that in the note of lord Whitworth, dated the 10th of May, and given in page one hundred and twelve of the official papers of London, the most essential passage is omitted, with an infidelity which could not escape censure."

The Moniteur then proceeds to give in a double column, copies of the note, in its original state, and as it has been printed by the English ministers. The difference between them consists in the omission of the following words in the first paragraph of the before-mentioned letter after the words "3rd instant:" "And this proposal having been judged inadmissible from the refusal of his majesty the emperor of Russia, to be a party thereto, and at the same time beyond his majesty's just pretensions."

"This infidelity, committed for the purpose of concealing a false allegation which can no longer be sustained, required the commission of another. The English ministers have, consequently, suppressed the note transmitted in answer on the 12th of May, which note was of the following tenour:—

"Paris, May 12.

"The undersigned has it in charge to acquaint his excellency lord Whitworth, ambassador from his Britannic majesty, that the first consul having proposed, in his note of the 14th of this month, [Floreal, that is, May 4,] that the island of Malta should be placed in the hands of one of the three guaranteeing powers, Russia, Austria, or Prussia, it would not be sufficient to set that proposition aside, to argue on the refusal which his majesty the emperor of Russia might make, of receiving this trust, since the intentions of their majesties the emperor of Germany and the king of Prussia would remain to be known.

"That besides the assertion contained in his excellency's note, dated 30th of this month, and which is expressed in these terms, 'from the refusal of his majesty the emperor of Russia to accede to it,' is entirely contrary to the guarantee which his imperial majesty formally offered, with the slight alterations which the first consul made no difficulty of adopting, and which he knows that the English ministry refused, meditating, beyond doubt, even then, the strange pretensions of retaining Malta.

"That, further, this assertion is also an absolute opposition to the assurances which the first consul has received from Petersburgh, since the message of his majesty has been known there, and which have just been renewed to him by an authentic communication, which count de Marcoff yesterday gave of the intentions of his court.

"It hence results, that it is impossible to reconcile the last communication made by his excellency lord Whitworth, with the fresh confirmation, which has just been received, of the dispositions of his majesty the emperor of Russia, and that it cannot but be supposed, that his Britannic majesty, when better informed, will, of himself, lose no time in causing to be given to his excellency, instructions different from those which he has communicated, in the name of his government.

(Signed) "C. M. TALLEYRAND."

The month of June commenced with many important debates in both houses of parliament; indeed, the convulsed state of the country, from the rupture which had taken place, and from the temper with which communications from the French cabinet were received, indicated no very favourable symptoms of good understanding, through every class of the inhabitants of Great Britain: however, that objects of internal national consequence might not be neglected, sir John William Anderson, one of the members for the city of London, presented a bill to the honse of commons, on the first of this month, "for improving the port of London; to authorize money to be advanced out of the consolidated fund, for improving and rendering more extensive the navigation of the river Thames; and for erecting new quays for the encouragement of commerce."

Previously to reading the custom duty consolidation bill, Mr. Price, (the lord mayor, and member of parliament for London,) presented a petition from the silk manufacturers, praying to be heard by counsel at the bar of the house, against that part of the consolidation duty act which regarded the importation of Bandana handkerchiefs. Hereupon sir William Curtis drew the attention of the house to the situation of the working silk weavers of Spitalfields; and presented a petition on their behalf, which set forth, "that there were no less than five thousand manufacturers, (who, with their families, at an average, employed about ten thousand looms,) all of whom were likely to be materially injured by the importation of such articles, and that they could prove, to the satisfaction of the house, they paid a more considerable duty on handkerchiefs of their own manufacture, than what the intended bill could possibly produce to the revenue." This produced an observation been imposed during the war, were removed, and they were placed, in every respect, on the same footing, with regard to commerce and intercourse, as the inhabitants of any other state in amity with his majesty, with which there existed no treaty of commerce.

"To a system of conduct thus open, liberal, and friendly, the proceedings of the French government afford the most striking contrast. The prohibitions which had been placed on the commerce of his majesty's subjects during the war, have been enforced with increased strictness and severity; violence had been offered, in several instances, to their vessels and their property; and, in no case, has justice been afforded to those who may have been aggrieved in consequence of such acts, nor has any satisfactory answer been given to the repeated representations made by his majesty's ministers or ambassador at Paris. Under such circumstances, when his majesty's subjects were not suffered to enjoy the common advantages of peace within the territories of the French republic, and the countries dependent upon it, the French government had recourse to the extraordinary measure of sending over to this country a number of persons for the professed purpose of residing in the most considerable sea-port towns of Great Britain and Ireland, in the character of commercial agents or consuls; but it was supposed that the real object of their mission was by no means of a commercial nature, some of them being military men, furnished with instructions to obtain the soundings of the harbours, and to procure military surveys of the places where it was intended they should reside. His majesty therefore considered these circumstances as decisive indications of the dispositions and intentions of the government by whom they were employed.

"The conduct of the French government, with respect to the commercial intercourse between the two countries, must therefore be considered as ill suited to a state of peace; and their proceedings in their more general political relations, as well as in those which immediately concern his majesty's dominions, appear to have been altogether inconsistent with every principle of good faith, moderation, and justice. His majesty has unfortunately had too much reason to observe, and to lament, that the system of violence, aggression, and aggrandizement, which characterized the proceedings of the different governments of France during the war, has been continued with as little disguise since its termination. They have continued to keep a French army in Holland, against the will, and in defiance of the remonstrances, of the Batavian government, and in repugnance to the letter of three solemn treaties. They have, in a period of peace, invaded the territory, and violated the independence of the Swiss nation, in defiance of the treaty of Luneville, which had stipulated the independence of their territory, and the right of the inhabitants to chuse their own form of government. They have annexed to the dominions of France, Piedmont, Parma, and Placentia, and the island of Elba, without allotting any provision to the king of Sardinia, whom they have despoiled of the most valuable part of his territory, though they were bound, by a solemn engagement to the emperor of Russia, to attend to his interests, and to provide for his establishment. It may, indeed, with truth be asserted, that the period which has elapsed since the conclusion of the Definitive Treaty, has been marked with one continued series of aggression, violence, and insult, on the part of the French government. His majesty learned, however, that no disposition to counteract these repeated infractions of treaties and acts of violence, was manifested by any of the powers most immediately interested in preventing them; and his majesty therefore felt that, with respect to these objects, his single effort could not be expected to produce any considerable advantage to those in whose favour they might be exerted.

"It was about this time that the French government first distinctly advanced the principle, that his majesty had no right to complain of the conduct, or to interfere with the proceedings of France, on any point which did not form a part of the stipulations of the Treaty of Amiens. The treaty of Amiens, and every other treaty, in providing for the objects to which it is particularly directed, does not assume or imply an indifference to all other objects which are not specified in its stipulations, much less does it adjudge them to be of a nature to be left to the will and caprice vation from Mr. Wilbraham Bootle, who observed, that a great majority of the manufacturers in the kingdom, were kept perfectly ignorant of the nature of this bill, otherwise a great number of other petitions would have been presented. He himself had several observations to make, more particularly as the bill respected the interests of the British potteries, many of which have been brought to considerable perfection, under the operation of a protecting duty on foreign china, which was far exceeded in excellence and beauty in many of the British manufactories of Derbyshire and other counties. This manufacture of British porcelain, was still in a progressive state of improvement, because men of very considerable capital had been induced to embark in it, under the faith of a protecting duty against foreign china: he stated that this excellent infant manufacture would suffer under the decrease proposed by the bill, from one hundred and nine to one hundred and fifty pounds per cent. which would operate as a most injurious discouragement to the British manufacturers.

(q) That is, chancery.

But the Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that such objections could only be brought forward in a committee on the bill, the only matter for present consideration being, the propriety or impropriety of consolidating the duty.

The next subject of debate was on a motion by lord Folkstone, for accounts of all representations by the French government, and of all steps taken by his majesty's ministers towards carrying into effect the second article of the treaty of Amiens.

In opposition to this, lord Hawkesbury observed, that the article, having been a subject of contention, his majesty thought it right to follow the precedent of former treaties; but the French government had laid in a claim, of a nature which could not be fairly resisted, namely, that the French government, in their treaties with other powers, had no such stipulation, and therefore it was just there should be set off such sums as were due for the maintenance of prisoners actually in the service, and under the command of his majesty's government; this did not apply to the troops of Austria, Russia, or Bavaria, which his majesty had thought proper to subsidize, but to the Hessians only. His lordship added, that this allowance on the part of his majesty, made such a difference on the face of the account, that it was impossible to ascertain on which side the balance was. The important point was the saving the principle itself.

General Gascoyne said, he understood, from what the secretary of state had mentioned, that there was no money due by this country in consequence of the article of the treaty. It would, therefore, be proper for the house to be informed, what was the setting off by the French government in the account for no less than eighteen thousand prisoners. It was the only article which appeared to promise advantage to this country, in that execrable treaty, if there was a balance against us. He understood, however, that it was only inserted as a matter of form, merely because it had made a part of former treaties. The general put some other questions to ministers, which they did not think necessary to answer. On the question being put, lord Folkstone's motion was carried.

The house then resolved itself into a committee on the "consolidation of the tax duties," in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer noticed, that so many inconveniences had arisen from the discordant decisions of magistrates and the judges on the subject of the assessed taxes in particular, that the people of the country were at a loss to discover in what manner they were liable to the duties. The opinions of the judges, however, having been declared, it was proposed that their opinions should constitute a part of the law of the land. To prevent evasions to which the window tax was in many instances liable, it would be proposed, that those exceeding certain dimensions should be charged as double windows. Instead of the whole duty on gardeners and game-keepers, those who may be only occasionally employed in those capacities, were in future to be taxed at no more than five shillings each. The tax upon race horses was at this time extremely disproportionate, they paying less than saddle horses. The former were now charged no more than two guineas a year each, and it was proposed that they should in future be charged two guineas over and above the tax upon saddle-horses, which they should also be subject to. In the assessed duties, as they stood, the tax was confined to the number of horses employed; and as it was known, that several familes used the same horses for coaches, chaises, sociables, &c. the same duty should attach to every vehicle of that description. There were, he said, other subordinate points, but those he mentioned were the most essential.

After a few observations by Mr. Shaw Lefevre and sir R. Buxton, the Chancellor of the Exchequer finally remarked, that, without giving in upon too great evasions, it would be a matter of much difficulty to make a distinction between persons of different descriptions who might have horses, but that it was provided by the bill, that those in real poverty and distress, should be quite exempted from the horse and window tax; and that those who only retained day servants for a few weeks, should not be subjected to the duty for a whole year. He then moved a resolution, that the present duties on coaches and horses for sale, should cease and determine, in order to be replaced by others, which was agreed to, and the report of the committee ordered to be received, and as this bill affected England only, he should propose a separate bill for extending its provisions also to Scotland, which was ordered.

The motion of earl Fitzwilliam, next day, in the house of lords, on the conduct of the ministry, attracted general attention. His lordship had given notice to this purpose on the preceding Thursday, May 26, and now delivered his opinion relative to the proofs of insolence, aggression, and encroachment displayed by the French government since the conclusion of the treaty, and the responsibility which ministers had incurred in not having at a much earlier caprice of the violent and powerful. The justice of the cause is alone a sufficient ground to warrant the interposition of any of the powers of Europe in the differences which may arise between other states; and the application and extent of that just interposition is to be determined solely by considerations of prudence.

"His majesty therefore judged it most expedient, under the circumstances which then affected Europe, to abstain from a recurrence to hostilities on account of the views of ambition and acts of aggression manifested by France on the continent; yet an experience of the character and dispositions of the French government could not fail to impress his majesty with a sense of the necessity of increased vigilance in guarding the rights and dignity of his crown, and in protecting the interests of his people. Whilst his majesty was actuated by these sentiments, he was called upon by the French government to evacuate the Island of Malta. His majesty had manifested from the moment of the signature of the Definitive Treaty, an anxious disposition to carry into full effect the stipulations of the Treaty of Amiens relative to that island. As soon as he was informed that an election of a grand master had taken place, under the auspices of the emperor of Russia, and that it had been agreed by the different priories assembled at St. Petersburgh, to acknowledge the person whom the court of Rome should select out of those who had been named by them to the grand master of the Order of St. John, his majesty proposed to the French government, for the purpose of avoiding any difficulties which might arise in the execution of the arrangement, to acknowledge that election to be valid: and when, in the month of August, (1802,) the French government applied to his majesty to permit the Neapolitan troops to be sent to the island of Malta, as a preliminary measure for preventing any unnecessary delay, his majesty consented, without hesitation, to this proposal, and gave directions for the admission of the Neapolitan troops into the island. His majesty has thus shewn his disposition not only to throw no obstacle in the way of the execution of the treaty, but, on the contrary, to facilitate the execution of it by every means in his power. His majesty cannot, however, admit, that at any period since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, the French government have had a right to call upon him, in conformity to the stipulations of that treaty, to withdraw his forces from the island of Malta. At the time when this demand was made by the French government, several of the most important stipulations of the arrangement respecting Malta remained unexecuted. The election of a grand master had not been carried into effect. The tenth article had stipulated, that the independence of the island should be placed under the guarantee and protection of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia. The emperor of Germany had acceded to the guarantee, but only on condition of a like accession on the part of the other powers specified in the article. The emperor of Russia had refused his accession, except on the condition that the Maltese langue should be abrogated; and the king of Prussia had given no answer whatever to the application which had been made to him to accede to the arrangement. But the fundamental principle, upon the existence of which depended the execution of the other parts of the article, had been defeated by the changes which had taken place in the constitution of the order since the conclusion of the treaty of peace. It was to the Order of St. John of Jerusalem that his majesty was, by the first stipulation of the tenth article, bound to restore the island of Malta. The order is defined to consist of those langues which were in existence at the time of the conclusion of the treaty; the three French langues having been abolished, and a Maltese langue added to the institution. The order consisted, therefore, at that time, of the following langues, viz. the langues of Arragon, Castile, Germany, Bavaria, and Russia. Since the conclusion of the Definitive Treaty, the langues of Arragon and Castile have been separated from the Order by Spain, a part of the Italian langue has been abolished by the annexation of Piedmont and Parma to France.

"Under these circumstances, the order of St. John cannot now be considered as that body to which, according to the stipulations of the treaty, the island was to be restored; and the funds indispensably necessary for its support, and for the maintenance of the independence of the island, earlier period laid the evidence of this hostile spirit before both houses of parliament. In bringing forward the motions which he meant to submit to their lordships' consideration, the noble earl wished it to be understood, that he was actuated by no motives of personal hostility to ministers. For many of them individually he felt the greatest respect, and no man was more ready to do justice to the respectability of their private character; no considerations, however, of this nature, should induce him to desert a duty which he felt that he owed to their lordships and the country. It was on public views that he brought forward the business, and on public grounds he should only ask for their lordships' support. Having stated this in explanation of his object, his lordship took up the consideration of the general subject, and in the course of his observations adverted to all the acts of aggression and aggrandizement on the part of the French government, from the time of signing the preliminaries of peace, and the corresponding conduct of ministers.

On adverting to the part of the French government, his lordship said, there had been many acts of insolence, of violence, and aggression, every one of which ought to have been the ground of serious remonstrance, as being diametrically opposite to the principles of the treaty which ministers had avowed at the time when the treaty was concluded. When the French government had agreed on preliminary articles of peace, his lordship begged the house to consider what was the line of conduct which it had pursued? Was this a conduct of a conciliatory nature? Was it of a nature which could at all induce a hope that peace might be preserved in the true spirit of peace? A very contrary spirit had on every occasion been evinced. Instead of a disposition to adopt that policy which might be considered as shewing some degree of respect for the rights of independent states, or that moderation which bespoke no wish for an extension of French power, acts had been committed which were totally inconsistent with a desire for the preservation of peace, and which could only originate from a fixed determination to pursue aggrandizement, whatever might be the consequence; his lordship then referred to the extraordinary step taken by Bonaparte, of procuring presidentship of the Italian republic. This, he contended, was neither more nor less than a direct annexation of the whole territory of which that republic was composed, to the already overgrown dominions of France. It was not a measure by which the connection between Italy and France might be rendered more intimate, but one by which the interests, the objects and the strength of the two countries were identified. Was a measure of this magnitude taking place during the interval between the signature of the preliminaries and a definitive treaty, a matter of light importance? Was it one to which, with reference to such a definitive treaty, no attention ought to have been given by ministers? But ministers had made no remonstrances, and it was from the knowledge that they had on this, as well as many other acts of violence and aggression on the part of the French government, that he had felt it his duty to bring the matter under discussion. That this very extraordinary measure took place in February 1802, and it was with the knowledge of this decisive proof of the disposition of the French government that the definitive treaty had been concluded. What then had been the spirit of encroachment displayed by the French government after the treaty was concluded? Was it of a description which could justify the expectation that permanent peace might be maintained? It was, on the contrary, distinguished by every evidence of aggression and hostility. A very few months elapsed after the conclusion of the treaty, when by a convention, of the grounds of which ministers had not given parliament and the country the smallest information, Parma and Placentia were ceded to France. It was in June that this new acquisition of territory was obtained, and still no remonstrance was resorted to by ministers. The French government, profiting by this spirit of forbearance, and actuated by a thirst of power which acknowledged no bounds, resolved that no opportunity of aggrandizement should be overlooked. In September, Piedmont was declared to be an intregal part of the French republic; and thus, whatever hope might have been previously entertained of the restoration of the liberty of Italy, it was now destroyed. It was henceforth left at the mercy of France, for who was ignorant that in every great contest Piedmont had always been considered as the key of Italy? All these repeated and unequivocal manifestations of a spirit inconsistent with the maintenance of peace had been given, and not a remonstrance had been heard from ministers. They appeared to allow the causes of jealousy to accumulate. They suffered the proofs of the hostile mind to augment, and still they took no effectual measures to provide against the consequence. The first step taken, which at all indicated a determination to resist this ambitious spirit, was issuing orders for retaining possession of the Cape of Good Hope. On what circumstances, however, he begged their lordships to consider, were these orders dispatched? Was it on receiving intelligence of the determination of Bonaparte to interfere in the affairs of Switzerland?—It was of importance to observe how the conduct of ministers on this subject ought to be considered. When they determined to interfere, they ought to have known what effect their interference was likely to produce. For if from the circumstances of the continent, at the time the remonstrances were made, it appeared, that they could be productive of no beneficial consequences, the remomstrances were in themselves highly inexpedient. Now, how did the case stand after being fairly considered? On the 3rd of October, Mr. Merry sent a dispatch to ministers, informing them of the exertions made by a Swiss deputy to procure the interference of some of the ministers of the great powers of Europe, in behalf of his persecuted country. In this dispatch it was stated that the application had been ineffectual. Most of the ministers were not only not disposed island, have been nearly, if not wholly, sequestered. As the conduct of the governments of France and Spain have in some instances directly, and in others indirectly, contributed to the changes which have taken place in the Order, and thus destroyed its means of snpporting its independence, it is to those governments, and not to his majesty, that the non-execution of the 10th article of the Treaty of Amiens must be ascribed.

"His majesty was induced by the Treaty of Peace to consent to abandon, and to restore to the Order of St. John, the island of Malta, on condition of its independence and neutrality. But a further condition, which must necessarily be supposed to have considerable influence with his majesty, in inducing him to make so important a concession was the acquiescence of the French government, in an arrangement for the security of the Levant, by the eighth and ninth articles in the treaty stipulating the integrity of the Turkish empire, and the independence of the Ionian Islands. But the views of the French government must be manifest to all the world, from the official publication of the report of colonel Sebastiani; from the conduct of that officer, and of the other French agents in Egypt, Syria, and the Ionian Islands, and from the distinct admission of the first consul himself, in his communication with lord Whitworth. His majesty was, therefore, warranted in considering it to be the determination of the French government to violate those articles of the Treaty of Peace, which stipulated for the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire and of the Ionian Islands, and consequently he would not have been justified in evacuating the island of Malta, without receiving some other security, which might equally provide for these important objects. His majesty accordingly feels that he has an incontestible claim, in consequence of the conduct of France since the Treaty of Peace, and with reference to the objects which made part of the stipulations of that treaty, to refuse under the present circumstances, to relinquish the possession of the island of Malta. Yet, notwithstanding this right, so clear and so unquestionable, the alternative presented by the French government to his majesty, in language the most peremptory and menacing, was the evacuation of Malta, or the renewal of war.

"The report of colonel Sebastiani contains the most unwarrantable insinuations and charges against his majesty's government, against the officer who commanded his forces in Egypt, and against the British army in that quarter. This paper cannot be considered as the publication of a private individual; it has been avowed, and indeed bears evidence upon the face of it, that it is the official report of an accredited agent, published by the authority of the government to which it was addressed, who thereby have given it their express sanction. This report had been published a very short time, when another indignity was offered to this country in the communication of the first consul of France to the legislative body. In this communication he presumes to affirm, in the character of chief magistrate of that country, 'That Great Britain cannot singly contend against the power of France;' an assertion as unfounded as it is indecent, disproved by the events of many wars, and by none more than by those of the war which has been recently concluded. Such an assertion, advanced in the most solemn official act of a government, and thereby meant to be avowed to all the powers of Europe, can be considered in no other light than as a defiance publicly offered to his majesty, and to a brave and powerful people, who are both willing and able to defend his just rights, and those of their country, against every insult and aggression.

"The conduct of the first consul to his majesty's ambassador at his audience, in presence of the ministers of most of the sovereigns and states of Europe, furnishes another instance of provocation on the part of the French government, which it would be improper not to notice on the present occasion. At the very time when his majesty was demanding satisfaction and explanation on some of the points above-mentioned, the French minister at Hamburgh endeavoured to obtain the insertion, in the Hamburgh paper, of a most gross and opprobrious libel against his majesty; and when difficulties were made respecting the insertion of it, he availed himself of his official character of minister of the French republic, posed to listen to their application, but they were afraid of admitting him within their threshold, from a dread of giving offence to the first consul. With the knowledge of all this, ministers did interfere when they must have known that interference could not be beneficial. They had passed over the fairest opportunities of dignified and effectual remonstrance, and had made a shew of remonstrances when it could not with the smallest dignity be employed. But the cases to which he had alluded, were not all which, though forming just ground of complaint, had not been taken up with sufficient spirit by ministers. His lordship then alluded to the manner in which British sublects had been abused, and British property confiscated, which did not appear to him to have been made the ground of sufficient remonstrance. Our claims to reparation and redress had not been urged with that spirit and that energy which the extreme importance of the subject required. His lordship next proceeded to the direct point in which ministers had chosen to make their final stand, and had thought proper to assume a determination no longer to submit to the insolence and the aggressions of the French government. After all the instances of aggression which had occurred; after all the proofs which had been given, of a disposition altogether inconsistent with the independence and the safety of other states; after the most unequivocal demonstrations of a mind incurably hostile to this country, ministers had instructed lord Whitworth, to express to the French government, their readiness to give up Malta agreeably to the conditions of the treaty. Having given such instructions, attention was naturally directed to the circumstances which produced the subsequent determination of ministers to retain Malta, as a means of additional security against the future views of the French government. Lord Hawkesbury, in consequence of the report of Sebastiani, disclosing the views of the French government, addresses a note to our ambassador, stating, that ministers expected that additional security, to which these views gave them a fair claim. Till the middle of February, the ambitious designs of the French government were not resisted by ministers, and at length they took their stand at a point which, compared with various other causes of offence, was very secondary in real importance. From all these considerations, he conceived himself fully warranted in drawing the inference which he meant to found on his first proposition, that ministers in full possession of sufficient proofs of the hostile mind of the French government, of its uninterrupted insults and aggressions from the time that the treaty of peace had been signed to the day when his majesty's message of the 8th of March was delivered, were highly censurable in not declaring what was the real situation of the country. At the time that they were sufficiently sensible of the existence of this spirit, they continued to hold out to parliament and to the country the hope of the continuance of peace. At the very moment when there could remain no reasonable expectation of the maintenance of peace, the public was deceived with the expectation that there was a prospect not of short and precarious, but of solid and permanent repose, from all the miseries attendant on war. Parliament and the public had at all times a clear and undoubted right to know, from the servants of the crown, what was the real situation of the country. This information ministers had most assiduously concealed, and while they sheltered themselves behind responsibility, the country was brought into a situation more critical and more dangerous than had ever been paralleled in the records of our history. Considering the state of darkness relative to the most interesting matters in which ministers had so long left their lordships, it was, he contended, highly necessary to institute an inquiry, with the view of vindicating their honour against a supposition of being indifferent to the great duties which they were called on to perform. It was solely from this consideration of public duty that he had been induced to bring forward the propositions with which he meant to conclude. The situation in which the country was placed had become unquestionably highly arduous and critical, and to meet the danger to which it was exposed it was necessary that the public should have an assurance of the capacity of the ministers of the crown for directing the resources and the energies of the people. It was proper at a time when all ranks would be called on to contribute great sacrifices for the public service, that they should have confidence in the talents and the knowledge of those by whom these sacrifices were to be applied for the service of the empire. It was necessary too, when engaging in a contest in which the opinion or the mediation of other powers might be required, that the character of the government of the country should be such as to command respect. When he looked at the whole of the negociations, when he considered the manner in which all the hostile acts of the French government had been viewed by them, he could not admit that his majesty's present servants were qualified to secure confidence with the country at home, or inspire respect among governments abroad. The noble earl concluded with moving several resolutions, of which the two following are the most important:

1st. Resolved, "That it appears to this house, from the declaration issued by his majesty on the 18th instant, and laid before this house by his majesty's command, that the conduct of the French republic towards this country during the whole period which has elapsed since the conclusion of the definitive treaty of peace, is considered by his majesty's ministers as having exhibited 'one continued series of aggression, violence, and insult;' and as necessarily creating a 'thorough conviction,' of a system deliberately 'adopted by France, for the purpose of degrading, vilifying, and insulting his majesty and his government."

2d. Resolved, "That his majesty's ministers having throughout the whole period from the definitive treaty of peace to the breaking out of the present war, neither communicated to parliament any knowledge of the sense which they now appear to have entertained respecting the conduct and system of France, nor any regular information of the particulars on which the same was founded, or the steps taken by his majesty's government thereupon, have thereby withheld from this house the necessary materials for the due and full discharge of its constitutional functions; and that by encouraging throughout the country an unfounded security and confidence in the permanence of the peace; they have embarrassed and perplexed our commerce; have deceived the expectations, and unnecessarily harrassed the spirit of the people; and have materially increased and aggravated the difficulties of our actual situation." His lordship also moved a third resolution for a vote of censure on the ministers for their conduct.

On the question being put on the first resolution from the woolsack,

Lord Limerick vindicated the conduct of ministers. He professed his inability to enter into a distinction which on a former evening had been studiously attempted to be established betwixt the conduct of ministers and the justice of the war into which the ambition of France had lic, to require the publication of it, by order of his government, in the Gazette of the senate of that town. With this requisition the senate of Hamburgh was induced to comply; and thus has the independence of that town been violated, and a free state made the instrument of propagating throughout Europe, the most offensive and unfounded calumnies against his majesty and his government. His majesty might add to this list of indignities, the requisition which the French government have repeatedly urged, that the laws and constitution of his country should be changed relative to the liberty of the press. His majesty might likewise add, the calls which the French government have, on several occasions, made upon him to violate the laws of hospitality, with respect to persons who had found an asylum within his dominions, and against whose conduct no charge whatever has at any time been substantiated.

"Under all these insults and provocations, his majesty, not without a due sense of his dignity, has proceeded with every degree of temper and moderation to obtain satisfaction and redress, while he has neglected no means consistent with his honour and the safety of his dominions, to induce the government of France to concede to him, what is, in his judgement, absolutely necessary for the future tranquillity of Europe. His efforts in this respect have proved abortive, and he has therefore judged it necessary to order his ambassador to leave Paris. In having recourse to this proceeding, it has been his majesty's object to put an end to the fruitless discussions which have too long subsisted between the two governments, and to close a period of suspense peculiarly injurious to the subjects of his majesty.

"But though the provocations which his majesty has received, might entitle him to larger claims than those which he has advanced, yet anxious to prevent calamities which might thus be extended to every part of Europe, he is still willing, as far as is consistent with his own honour, to concur in an arrangement by which satisfaction shall be given to him, for the indignities which have been offered to his crown and to his people, and substantial security afforded against further encroachments on the part of France.

"His majesty has thus distinctly and unreservedly stated the reasons of those proceedings to which he has found himself compelled to resort. He is actuated by no disposition to interfere in the internal concerns of any other state; by no projects of conquest and aggrandizement; but solely by a sense of what is due to the honour of his crown, and the interests of his people, and by an anxious desire to obstruct the further progress of a system, which if not resisted, may prove fatal to every part of the civilized world."

forced

forced us to enter for the support of all that is estimable in society. He then took up the question before the house in a clear stile of argument. Concerning the responsibility under which the ministers had attempted to shelter their conduct, much had been said, and it was made the subject of complaint that ministers had not at a much earlier period put the house in possession of information relative to the ambitious views of the French government. With regard to the objects started against the conduct of ministers, from the time of the signature of the preliminaries to the period when the treaty was concluded, they had formerly been so fully considered and so satisfactorily answered, that, to dwell on them at present, would be equally inexpedient and unnecessary. The conduct of ministers respecting Switzerland had been condemned: to him it appeared at once proper and spirited. The ministers of all the great continental powers had been addressed with a view of obtaining their mediation with the first consul, to avert the evils with which Switzerland was threatened, and which afterwards it so fully experienced. To these applications no sort of attention had been given, except by the ministers of this country. Was a disposition to listen to the remonstrances of a brave and injured people, a ground of censure? Was it a subject of fair complaint, that a hope was held out of a determination to give every degree of support which was likely to be effectual in a contest for usages and for privileges, endeared by every consideration that is most cherished by the heart of man? But this general principle of the interference of ministers respecting Switzerland appeared to be condemned. Degraded as the powers of the continent had shewn themselves to be, ministers had no choice left but to make a separate remonstrance to the French government. Such a remonstrance, their lordships were aware, had been presented, and if it failed of effect, neither the honour or general character of the country were at all compromised. Ministers had sent a confidential agent to Switzerland, not to foment a spirit of rebellion; not to elude them with false hopes and expectations of success; but to ascertain the real disposition of the people; to find out what was their ability for effectual resistance, and to see what prospect there was that with such assistance as might have been given, by this country, there was any probability that this resistance would promote the end desired. On inquiry it was ascertained, that with all their detestation of French persecution, successful resistance was impossible, and therefore ministers found further interference unnecessary. He contended that in the whole conduct of ministers, as far as interference in the affairs of Switzerland was concerned, they had acted so as to entitle them to fair and honourable support. Ministers had been loudly accused for not having sooner declared their opinion that war had become necessary. The circumstances under which the peace had been concluded were to be considered before such an objection could be fairly started. He hoped it would not be contended that ministers were not desirous of the continuance of peace; for on this they rested their pretensions to popularity, and it was not likely they would do any thing to destroy the good opinion which had been created in their favour, by rashly plunging the country in war. Malta, he said, was the grand point in dispute, and to remove the grounds of difference no efforts had been omitted. They had endeavoured to procure the assent of the guaranteeing powers; they had given every facility for the election of a grand master; they had pursued this object in the way most calculated to evince their determination to act in the true spirit of peace. They found soon after the conclusion of the treaty, that the French government, instead of discovering a spirit of conciliation, evinced a disposition rancorous and hostile. They received a proposal insolent and outrageous in the highest degree! a proposition to curtail or to suppress the most valuable privilege and the firmest support of the British constitution—the freedom of full and fair discussion! To such a proposal, ministers of course refused to accede; but even here their language was mild and moderate. To a most detestable and cruel demand, to drive from our land the representatives of a family once eminent for wealth and power, but now eminent only in misfortune, the answer of ministers was at once firm and dignified. Our ministers were called upon to banish the remains of an ancient nobility and the wreck of a venerable priesthood. It had been objected to ministers, that their orders and counter-orders respecting the Cape of Good Hope, betrayed want of firmness and consistency of character. Ministers had reason to believe that a plan was in contemplation by which Holland was to be incorporated with France. Under such an expectation, it was clear that the Cape would necessarily fall into the hands of France, the moment it was surrendered. It was on this principle that the order for retaining the Cape was founded, and it was not till an explanation on the subject was obtained, that a second order for its evacuation was dispatched. Ministers, after this explanation had been obtained, had no pretence for refusing to comply with the terms of the treaty. His lordship condemned Sebastiani's report in very energetic terms. It appeared to him to express such clear evidence of the insidious designs of the first consul, both with respect to Egypt and the Ionian islands, that if ministers had not laid hold of it in establishing a just claim to further security on the part of this country, they would have forfeited all claims to public confidence. The article in the Hamburgh paper, which had excited so much attention, and called forth such just indignation, was one of the foulest and most malignant libels that ever was published against the government of an independent country, and reflected discredit on the character of M. Rheinard, by whose influence it was inserted. Under all these considerations, Ministers had called for additional security, but no offer of security had been obtained. On the contrary Talleyrand declared that the question betwixt the two countries lay within a very narrow compass. It was simply Malta, or war. Retain Malta, and war will be considered to be declared. His lordship declared that he had reflected much on the causes of the hatred of Bonaparte to this country; who, he contended, wished to remove from the eyes of his debased and degraded subjects, the image of Great Britain, free and happy; and hence his eternal hostility to a people, all whose institutions only placed his own tyranny in the stronger colours. His lordship then declared his approbation of the conduct of ministers.

Earl Grosvenor conceived that the present question ought to be moved. The accusation against ministers contained in the resolutions was of the most weighty nature, and he believed that the noble lords would pause before they consented to entertain the motion. Noble lords could not but be aware that if the motion was carried, it would be followed up by an impeachment against ministers. Before blame was, however, attached so strongly to them, and such weighty accusations were produced, it was but fair to look to the situation of affairs, when ministers were called on to take on themselves the conduct of government. It would be recollected that the Northern Confederacy then existed, and that they had succeeded in concluding a convention, which their lordships had highly applauded. It would be recollected that ministers had formed a treaty of peace, which had also been highly approved by both houses of parliament. His lordship concluded by observing, that no disadvantage had arisen from the experiment, and it was now clear beyond the possibility of doubt that war was rendered unavoidable by the wild and ungovernable spirit of hostility and ambition manifested by the French government; and hinted that till Bonaparte was displaced, no permanent repose could exist in Europe.

Lord Darnley took a view of the subject on similar grounds, and said, among other things, that it should be remembered that those persons who are supposed most decidedly adverse to war on all occasions, have stated the point of national honour to be almost the only legitimate ground of warfare. What could be more flagrant than the cause of the vessel which was forced into a port of France by stress of weather, or of that which was confiscated, because the captain had a few knives and plates for his own use of English manufacture? Were not these acts of injustice and hostility, and yet as far as we know, no notice was taken of them, except in the presenting a few whining remonstrances at Paris, which were treated with silent contempt. In the case of Switzerland, a remonstrance of the same sort had been presented, and with the same effect: and here he must repeat what he had stated on former occasions, that such remonstrances were puerile, and far beneath the dignity of a great and powerful nation. We ought certainly either to have remonstrated with effect, that is, have gone to war, if our remonstrances had been rejected, or not remonstrated at all. His lordship forbore to dwell on the contradictory orders respecting the surrender of the Cape, and proceeded to that of Malta, which was of the greatest consequence in itself, and because it had had immediately led to the present war; and here he referred back to the negociation of Amiens, where the unintelligible and absurd tenth article of the treaty left it open to certain dispute, and necessarily produced the consequences which have followed. If, during these negociations, that line of dignified firmness to which he had alluded had been adopted, instead of that of weakness and concession which had been preferred, he must repeat, that in all probability, Malta would have been ours, and peace established on a secure and honourable basis; or if we had been obliged to take up arms again, we should have done so with many advantages which we had since relinquished. On his part, lord Darnley said, he most firmly believed that if we had shewn ourselves, and Bonaparte had believed us to be in earnest, he would at that time have preferred the loss of Malta to that of St. Domingo or his fleet. But he early saw our blind fondness for peace, and fear of war, and he has taken full advantage of it, till at last he has strained the cord till he has broken it. Our patience and forbearance are at length exhausted, and we are at last obliged to fight. He should therefore assent to the propositions moved that night by the noble earl, because he thought they could not be controverted.

Lord Borringdon differed entirely from the noble lord who had just sat down, as to its being of little moment who was minister or who was not. He wished the present ministers to strengthen themselves by every possible accession of talent. He could not help remarking, and giving it as his opinion, from the most careful perusal of the correspondence, that there was not one point previous to the great leading question relative to Malta, which could in any way particularly excite the feelings of the nation. The noble lord who spoke first, had asked whether the intention of France to regain, or rather to get entirely the possession of Egypt, was matter in any shape novel? Certainly it was a favourite object of the Bourbons during the whole of the last century. Still he would contend, with respect to Bonaparte again getting that country, that previous to the mission of Sebastiani, and the report made by that officer, no evidence could be given that the First Consul's views were directed thither, or that any intention of the kind was at all rendered manifest and clear. He did not approve of the mode in which the present ministers came into power, nor did he think highly of their talents; but he would not, therefore, withhold his approbation when it was deserved, and therefore he voted now in their defence.

The Duke of Cumberland said, he was induced to rise merely from an expression which had fallen from a noble lord, who had asserted that he disapproved of the mode in which the present administration came into office. What the noble lord might intend by the mode, he could not really say, but he had never known a set of men come into office in a more honourable manner.

Lord Borringdon explained, that in making use of the expression quoted by the royal duke, he had not been actuated by any motive of disrespect towards his majesty's ministers.

The earl of Suffolk said, if it was not for the partition of Poland, a prince of the house of Bourbon would now be upon the throne of France. His lordship added, he considered that the cause of the hostile spirit manifested by Bonaparte did not arise so much from the circumstances of the negociation, as from the conduct of his majesty's former ministers, in the violation of the treaty of El-Arisch; and he contrasted the moderate and civil conduct of the present ministers with lord Grenville's answer to Bonaparte's letter, which had cost this country two years of destructive war, and 150,000,000*l.* of money.

The earl of Westmoreland trusted that he should stand excused in the opinion of the house, if he endeavoured to answer and refute the various charges which had been brought against ministers. He surely could not be contradicted when he asserted that the non-performance of a treaty was tantamount to a declaration of war, as he was strengthened and fortified by the words of Bonaparte himself, and also the opinion of Talleyrand. A refusal to evacuate Malta, because the letter of that treaty could not be fulfilled, was made a declaration of war. But was it the duty of ministers to have patiently waited until the sword was unsheathed, and the Chief Consul had withdrawn his troops from the West Indies, before hostilities should be commenced by this country? The importance of Malta had not been denied; that island was the key to the Levant, the protection of Egypt, consequently in a very eminent degree the guardian of our possessions in India. It was also of much moment to Great Britain as a naval station, for watching the movements of the powers of France and Spain in that quarter. After a few arguments in support of the same system, his lordship concluded by calling upon the house to be unanimous in supporting the war, in defence of the liberties of the people, in defence of the constitution of the country, and in defence of his majesty's sacred person.

Lord Mulgrave, after reprobating the conduct of the first consul, said, that it might reasonably be expected that Bonaparte would attempt the invasion of this country, since he had made no scruple in avowing his intention of hazarding his life, his fame, and those armies which had exalted him to that pinnacle of greatness on which he stood. The war, therefore, was to be maintained by the resources and energies of a great and free people, unanimous and hearty in the contest, in opposition to conscripts and forced measures. He trusted ministers would soon bring down to the house measures of revenue of a lasting and permanent kind, wisely calculated to bear as little on the people as the nature of the contest would allow. He lamented the debate which had occurred, and in order that there might be no more of it, he should move that the house do now adjourn.

The earl of Carlisle spoke in terms of the highest praise as to the abilities and eloquence of the noble lord who spoke first in the debate, and recapitulated some of his lordship's arguments, in order to point out their force, and impress them the stronger on the house. His lordship reprobated the proposal of such a motion when the house were employed in the discharge of one of their highest and most important constitutional duties, an inquiry into the conduct of his majesty's ministers, in the course of a negociation which, through their neglect, had led the country into the state in which it stood—of actual war with France. He also implored the house to consider in what a situation they placed his majesty's ministers, if such a motion should be carried. They would be deprived of the opportunity of clearing themselves, if they could clear themselves, of one of the heaviest charges that ever was brought against ministers. He urged the necessity of proceeding in the present debate, that every one might state the grounds on which he conceived his majesty's ministers deserved the severe censure passed upon their conduct, and enable them to make their defence. It was more necessary that this should be the course of proceeding, because, although his majesty's ministers had talked much of their acknowledging their responsibility, and being ready to meet inquiry; yet the word responsibility, as applied to ministers, appeared lately to have lost its meaning. The word, responsibility, had been better understood by our ancestors. Cardinal Wolsey, who was undoubtedly a great minister, towards the end of his life felt what responsibility in the king's servants really was. Lord Strafford, in like manner, paid the price of responsibility for his conduct. Other ministers, and great officers of state, for their mal-practices, paid the same price; and it was highly necessary that the ministers of this day should be taught how aweful and serious a thing responsibility was. Ministers, he contended, were answerable for every charge which should be brought against them by parliament, and which was supported by arguments founded in reason; yet, he was sorry to say, it was too common a mode of evading that aweful responsibility to which they were liable, to say, that in a time of peace they should not disturb the public tranquillity, or cause any ferment in the public mind, by instituting an inquiry as to what had passed during a period of hostility and irritation of the minds of the contending powers. In war, it was urged, on the other hand, it was not becoming to clog the operations of the government for the good of our country, by instituting an inquiry which might at that time, by throwing a reflection on the conduct of their rulers, damp the ardour of our countrymen. If this sort of general principle were to be adopted by the legislature, there would be an excuse, not only for every species of incapacity or inability, but also for every dereliction of all principle, and even a total want of integrity might escape the justice of parliamentary censure, or parliamentary punishment. The conduct of his majesty's ministers appearing to him highly culpable in many points of view, he felt himself therefore bound, to support the motion.

The earl of Carnarvon reprobated the conduct of his majesty's majesty's ministers both at the time of the definitive treaty and during the whole of the negociation which had since taken place. He said it appeared from the papers on the table, that they knew, when they signed the definitive treaty, that the article respecting Malta could not be carried into execution, and when they defended the preliminary articles, and assured the house, that the peace was likely to be safe, secure, and permanent, on the ground of their knowledge of the amicable tone and temper of the first consul towards this country, at the time that they could not but be aware, that the very reverse was the fact. The definitive treaty, therefore, instead of being a wise, an efficient, and sincere treaty, was a treaty founded in delusion and fraud. His lordship said, ministers were highly criminal for having not only deceived the house by giving them repeated assurances, that every thing pacific was evinced in the conduct of the chief consul, where they knew to the contrary, but by unconstitutionally withholding that information which they ought from time to time to have communicated to parliament. His lordship ended with declaring, that he should give his negative to the motion of adjournment, and vote for the resolutions.

Lord Ellenborough declared, that the respect and esteem which he felt for the characters of his majesty's confidential servants, both in their public and private capacity, made him indignant at the frequency of such reflections, as from day to day rang the changes on the hacknied charge of the incapacity of his majesty's ministers, their weakness, and imbecility. He then reprobated the conduct of the first consul, and concluded by supporting the motion of adjournment.

Earl Spencer considered many of the public evils which had occurred, as owing to the premature pledge given by ministers on the subject of peace—a pledge which bound them up in the negociation which preceded the definitive treaty. It was said that peace had been called for by the voice of the country. He could not allow it to be said that at the period of the preliminaries, there was any such clamour for peace as could force ministers into rash and inadequate engagements. He next proceeded to consider the delay which had taken place in ministers announcing to parliament the hostile views of France. In reading over the declaration, he found that most, if not all of the aggressions complained of, except Sebastiani's report, were of an old date, and previous to the assembling of parliament, yet, for months after that, ministers had continued to conceal those very aggressions of which they complained. The French aggressions, and the conduct of ministry respecting Switzerland, Malta, &c. next engaged his lordship's censure; after which he added, that when these things were considered, it was not mere vague charges that were made against ministers. They were arraigned of incapacity and misconduct upon specific facts and circumstances presented to the attention of the house in the papers on the table. Those who brought forward and supported the resolutions proposed, did so from feelings of public duty. It was in vain to talk of unanimity in the maintenance of the public cause, unless we boldly faced our situation, and examined all the means by which our safety was to be promoted. In this view he considered it as of the greatest importance to examine the conduct of ministers, both in the negociation of peace and the course they took to preserve it. No man was less than him disposed to contest the prerogative which gave to the king the choice of his ministers; but, on the other hand, it was the duty of the house, both for the sake of the king and the public, to examine the measures of ministers, and if they did not appear deserving of confidence, it was competent for them to address the throne for their removal. He concluded with saying that he should vote for the resolution.

Viscount Melville resolved to vote for the adjournment.

Lord Hobart pointed out the great injustice the house would manifest in supporting the motion of adjournment. Could he on such an occasion be influenced by personal motives, he might consent to such a motion, because he was conscious it would add much to the convenience of the house, as well as to the convenience of ministers, under the present circumstances of the country. If the ministers were to be censured and disgraced under the present circumstances, it would naturally follow, that they ought to be dismissed, or the measures necessary to be pursued for the defence of the country would be enfeebled and rendered inefficient, and of little utility. Considering the arduous and difficult task that ministers had to perform ever since they came into office, undoubtedly many of their acts might be highly questionable; but so conscious was he, that the more their conduct was examined, the more it would be found that every step they had taken had been taken with great anxiety, with great caution, and with a most earnest endeavour to avoid the depriving the country of the continuance of the blessings of peace. His lordship was so conscious of this, and at the same time, that their whole conduct would be scrupulously inquired into, that whenever inquiry had been talked of and menaced, he had always declared that they were ready to meet it. He had never said he was anxious to court it, but prepared to meet it; now, therefore, as motions of censure, amounted in substance to a desire of the removal of ministers, he earnestly entreated the house not to vote the adjournment proposed, but to go on with the debate, and decide upon the resolutions, respecting which they had already heard so much that day, and, no doubt, would hear much more.

Lord Carysfort adverted to the conduct of ministers, and censured it as having prevented that house from exercising its constitutional privileges and rights. His majesty had the exclusive prerogative of making peace and war, in common with every other sovereign; but there was another thing by which he was distinguished from all other sovereigns on earth, and that was the appeal to the voice of his people by consulting parliament. The silence of ministers had not only prevented parliament from exercising its constitutional privileges, but had very materially injured the people. Nothing could more have facilitated the bringing about of peace, than the statement of some particular point as the cause of war. The point was not communicated to parliament, for the very good reason that ministers themselves had not fixed upon it. He concluded by declaring his approbation of the motion of censure upon his majesty's ministers.

Lord Grenville said, that it had been contended that his majesty's ministers have a right to complain of the manner in which the present subject had been treated, alledging that it was in our power, who thus accuse them, to have brought all the points to an issue when the great question as to the expediency of the war was discussed in that house. Was there, his lordship asked, any thing in this course of proceeding which any friend of his country need be ashamed to avow? Was it not, on the contrary, the plain and manifest method of reconciling what noble lords might feel their duty towards ministers with a due consideration of the arduous and critical circumstances in which the country was placed? Another motive for this course was, that when a general dissatisfaction at the conduct of ministers had been intimated, those who had expressed that opinion had been called on to specify the particulars of their charge, that ministers might know in what points they were accused. Yielding to this requisition, the present mode of bringing on the question had been adopted; and would it, he asked the house, be said, with any justice or candour, that those whose duty placed them in the situation of accusers, by following suggestions thus made, shewed any disposition to take advantage of parliamentary form, to forward any objects they might have in view? On the contrary, did they not by this proceeding discharge a very painful duty, as much as possible, in conformity to the feelings and opinions of others? He and other noble lords, who thought as he did in respect to the conduct of his majesty's servants, had frequently expressed their opinion of it to the house, that it was not in general such as to entitle them to any confidence in the trying and arduous situation in which the country was placed. On these occasions, the answer, as he had said, uniformly was, do not hover in generalities—bring forth specific charges, that his majesty's ministers may know what they have to answer. We accept the challenge; we produce our specific charges. Then we are told that all these points might have been brought to issue, when ministers themselves brought forward the general question, as to the existence and policy of the war. We, on the contrary, were anxious to give no interruption to that general question, affecting, as its decision did, the great and vital interest of the country. This question disposed of, we now, from the very papers produced by ministers in their own justification, produce those specific charges we were by their defenders called upon to do. If the other mode alluded to by the noble and learned lord were really thought to be desirable, they might on the motion of any noble lord be adopted. It was now said, do not bring forward your charges, but make a motion tending to criminate ministers, or referring the whole to a committee. At the present present moment we wish to discuss the resolutions brought forward by the noble earl, as being most adapted to the wishes hitherto expressed. Then we are told that ministers can defend themselves better in a committee. If so, the noble and learned lord knows that any lord is competent to turn the form of a debate into a committee. Such had been the conduct of his majesty's ministers ever since the conclusion of the preliminary treaty, that his lordship thought the honour of the house and interest of the public were equally concerned in forwarding the investigation to which the motion led. Notwithstanding the wide scope which had been alledged as a ground of complaint, those who accused his majesty's ministers were ready to go into the subject charge by charge. It could by no means be said, that it was they who moved the question of adjournment. This was entirely with the adverse party, and so was in no wise imputable to them. The particulars of the present motion were two facts, and a consequence that manifestly, when these were established, resulted from them. The inference or just result from these was not, as had been stated, that an address was to be proposed for the removal of his majesty's servants. All that the inferences went to establish was, that his majesty's ministers wanted the confidence of that house.

His lordship contended that the discussion of the conduct of ministers involved a great constitutional principle, as to just intercourse and proper communication between the government and parliament of the country. The charge against ministers was, that, not by accident, but by a deliberate systematic conduct, they precluded parliament from that knowledge of public events which was indisputably necessary to the performance of its duty. Communications of this kind were indispensible, he contended, to the just correspondence and constitutional understanding between the executive government and parliament. He might refer, he said, in investigating this subject, to the ministerial defence of the preliminary articles, in supporting which ministers declared there was nothing in the person who ruled over France, or in the circumstances of the times, that should render the peace less likely to continue than any that ever was made. His lordship then entered on an elaborate display of the circumstances which took place since the definitive treaty had been signed, and concluded by opposing the adjournment, and expressing a wish that the resolutions should meet that discussion which was due to their importance.

The Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon) could by no means give his assent to the motion of adjournment, and conceived it would be a stigma on his character were he to do so. He trusted, he said, that the conduct of ministers rested on no improper vindication; for, conscious of having done the best they could for their country, they had no apprehensions from appealing to its justice; and absurd indeed would it be in them to consent to a motion of adjournment on the present question, which would only serve to paralyze their exertions in the arduous cause to which they were now pledged, and thus furnish a new pretence for reviving at the end of a month or six weeks, a motion for their censure and removal.

Lord Mulgrave vindicated himself against the charge of injustice and absurdity, and said, his motive for moving the question of adjournment was not as a shield to ministers, but to the country, against apparent disunion, and because, as there were many points in the conduct of ministers, which he could not conscientiously approve; and therefore, as he could not vote against the whole of the original motion, he preferred moving the adjournment.

The Earl of Warwick, after allowing to ministers all possible credit for their private virtues and inflexible integrity, did not think that the amiableness of their disposition was combined with talent sufficient to guide the affairs of the country at this difficult crisis. Their lordships then divided, when the numbers appeared, for the adjournment eighteen, against it one hundred and six. Majority eighty-eight. The house again divided on the previous question, when the numbers were, for the previous question, ninety-six, against it fourteen.

This important debate was resumed on the 6th, when on the order of the day being read for the additional resolutions proposed by earl Fitzwilliam, for THE CENSURE OF MINISTERS, his lordship adverted to the arguments that had been used on the side of administration, on occasion of the former debate, and combated them. So far from giving satisfaction to his mind, they had only more firmly impressed it with conviction, that the conduct of ministry had been such as justly merited the censure which it was the object of his resolutions to fix upon it. He concluded his observations on the question, and the arguments which had been adduced against his propositions, by declaring, that the effect of the whole upon his mind had been such as induced him to persevere in his former intentions of submitting the additional resolutions to the consideration of the house; which were in substance as follow:—Resolved, "That no firm and adequate representations had been made by his majesty's ministers relative to the system of aggression, in which France had constantly persevered since the conclusion of the Treaty of Amiens. That his majesty's ministers had, by these means, neglected the opportunity of bringing France to such an explanation as would either have prevented the renewal of the war, or obliged her to disclose her real intentions before the forces of this country had been to any considerable degree disbanded. And that their conduct had proved of the utmost injury and detriment to the nation. These were, that the tenth article of the Treaty of Amiens was constructed in such a way, as rendered it incapable of being executed:—that in these circumstances ministers had neglected to enter, till too late, into a discussion with France, relative to the best mode of applying a remedy to this defect; and the consequence had been, that the question how it was to be adjusted had, by these means, produced another rupture between the two countries.

Resolved, "That it was the duty of his majesty's ministers to have made early and spirited remonstrances against all those acts which constituted a series of aggressions, insults, &c. on the part of France, and by such representations to have endeavoured to ascertain, whether their course and progress could have been arrested without the necessity of recurring to force of arms. That before the determination of the French government was ascertained, they should not have proceeded to a reduction of our forces; and that the neglect of such duties on the part of his majesty's ministers, was injurious to the public interests."

The duke of Clarence remarked, that in whatever shape the motion had been introduced, he could not help considering it as a motion expressly made for the removal of his majesty's ministers. He rose, because he wished to say, that though he differed completely from the noble earl, yet he gave him credit for his consistency, as his motion was in the spirit, and constituted a part, of the system which he had uniformly pursued from the commencement of the French revolution. There were many parts of that system in which he had cordially agreed, and highly approved, but the continuation of the war was not in the number. Upon that point certainly he did differ from the noble earl, as he always thought that no opportunity should be lost to put an end to the horrors of war, and that the chance which the state of things appeared to afford for the attainment of that end, should not have been rejected. Ministers, therefore, did right in making peace, notwithstanding their expectations had been frustrated. How far indeed they ought to have agreed to the definitive treaty, is matter of serious consideration. That is a question which would involve the gross misconduct of the former administration, which brought the country into the state which the present ministers found it. On that subject he was ready to go into detail. Much stress had been laid upon the difficulties in the way of the execution of the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens, respecting Malta. Ministers did say they were anxious to secure the independence of that island, and that such was the object of the stipulations contained in the article. The present ministers, he said, had been accused for reducing our force. He did not admit that they did reduce it lower than was necessary for the safety and interest of the country. But supposing the charge to be founded in fact, it shewed that ministers were actuated by a pacific spirit, and repelled the charge which the enemy had brought against them, of wishing to renew the war. He had thought the peace at any time a matter of experiment, and in such a situation, it was impossible to know what the amount of the force should be. With regard to the navy, there were many opinions, and his highness owned he had not been without forming a judgement upon it. There was one circumstance, which it will be observed, is peculiar to our navy. We are a great commercial nation, and the manning of the navy must greatly interfere with our trade. His highness adverted to several other particulars, which had been mentioned in the course of the former debate, and concluded with with saying, that he felt himself disposed to negative the proposition of the noble earl.

Lords Minto, Grosvenor, Bolton, De Dunstanville, and Clifton, severally delivered their opinions, which were couched in a similar train of argument to what had been before brought forward. After which, lord Carysfort called the attention of the house to what was the real object in discussion. His lordship followed the order in which they stood enumerated in the three resolutions which had been read, and the first of which had been moved by his noble friend; as the last of these resolutions turned upon the cession of the Cape of Good Hope, in consequence of the order of the 17th of November, after they had sent out an order to retain it, dated the 16th of October. He argued at some length on the inconsistency of such conduct, and laid particular stress on the criminality of it. He concluded with declaring, that he should vote for the resolutions, the object of which was to pass a censure on his majesty's ministers.

Lord Hobart spoke at great length in defence of ministers, denied their having reduced the army and navy in the proportion that had been stated; and particularly dwelt on the subject of the Cape of Good Hope, which, he said, he did not hold in equal estimation with many of their lordships. If he was asked, whether he thought it of no value? certainly he should not answer in the affirmative. It had its value undoubtedly, but not to the extent that other noble lords attached to it. In the first place, it was not necessary that ships coming from or sailing to India should touch at it, and he had been informed from those best acquainted upon the subject, that no French cruizers could derive any advantage from it. The usual and the best practice of our Indiamen, was to keep at least the distance of thirty leagues from the Cape in their voyages to and from India. In the next place, it was to be considered that Cape Town could hardly be deemed a port; during the favourable season of six months in the year, ships might lay in Table Bay; but during the severe and tempestuous season, ships could only lay in False Bay, from which, on account of the boisterous sea, the worst of any part of the ocean, no man of war or cruizer could put to sea. But another consideration was the immense charge the Cape put us to, while it was in our own hands. It cost this country no less than one million and a half annually, whereas it would not cost us above four hundred thousand pounds to send out convoys with the several fleets of Indiamen which sailed from our ports at home to India, and from India home again.

Lord Grenville stated, that the object of the resolutions was to infer that it was the duty of his majesty's ministers to have remonstrated with the French government for the aggressions they had committed; and he contended, that in not having done so, their conduct had been highly criminal. He argued against that system of acquiescence in insult, which characterized the present government. His lordship was of opinion the resolutions should have been taken separately. He recapitulated the charges which they contained, observing that it was the duty of his majesty's ministers to have followed up, by strong remonstrances and representations, the acts of violence of the French republic. The second charge in the resolutions was partly a proof of the former one, attended with an assertion, that if the aggressions of France had been followed up with becoming spirit, it would have been productive of a proper answer; or, at least, if that answer had been contemptuously refused, the silence of the French government might have been construed into a declaration of war. It certainly would have been so construed by any government than such a one as at present directed the affairs of this country. He then adverted to the arrest of captain d'Auvergne in the streets of Paris; a more gross affront was, he said, never offered to any government, than that was; yet this flagrant retention of an officer wearing the king's uniform had never been resented, even by the slightest remonstrance. The noble lord called the consideration of the house to the object for which the war was undertaken. Was this great and illustrious nation, he observed, to involve itself in a war on the dispute respecting the paltry island of Lampedosa. If war had taken place to espouse the part of Holland, or the people of Switzerland, we might have been justified; but their lordships would see that something more than Malta, Lampedosa, and the different causes at present urged by ministers, is necessary to prove the grounds of the contest that is likely to ensue. If the Cape was spoken of, it would be obvious that ministers had violated the treaty of Amiens by not giving it up at the appointed time. On the 17th of August the troops were to have left that place. On the 16th of November we find the Dutch troops there, and the English in possession, and if a battle had taken place in consequence, many lives would have been lost, and ministers would have added one more charge to the many brought against them. His lordship concluded with remarking, that the importance of the contest we were now engaged in, had been kept back from public observation by ministers, whose measures, since the treaty of Amiens, had led to hostilities in consequence of making an insecure peace.

The Lord Chancellor expressed his astonishment at the expressions made use of by a noble lord, who had advanced opinions respecting the conduct of ministers, which he certainly could not wish to see realized. After which, going through the three propositions, and answering the charges imputed to his majesty's ministers, his lordship went into a course of general reasoning on the whole view of their conduct in first making the peace, and in since using their most anxious endeavours to preserve the continuance of it to their country. He said he perfectly agreed that the present was a war to check and restrain the ambitious spirit of aggrandizement, aggression, insult, and violence of the French government, which had by a system of offensive and injurious conduct showed that no country could repose in safety till that system was put an end to. His lordship adverted to the case of captain d'Auvergne, who, he said, was not a subject of this kingdom, and that consequently his case stood on very different grounds from that on which the case of a subject of this country would do. He also denied that his majesty's ministers had any information of colonel Sebastiani's conduct in Egypt, till his report was published, and they received a dispatch from general Stuart, informing them of Sebastiani's conduct in Egypt, with respect to his application to him (general Stuart) as to the non-evacuation of Egypt.

Earl Spencer said, that having listened with the greatest attention to the arguments of the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and being perfectly conscious, that no man was more capable of defending the conduct of his majesty's ministers, if it could be defended, yet he must still find himself under the necessity of voting for the resolutions. The arguments of the noble and learned lord appeared to him to be very poor ones, where arguments so much stronger were necessary to be urged. In the first place the noble and learned lord had said, that the case of captain d'Auvergne was not before parliament. He would ask, whose fault was it that it was not before parliament? He had himself asked for papers concerning it, and a noble secretary of state had promised to lay information respecting it before the house, but he never had made good his promise. With regard to there having been a difference as to the ground of complaint between the treatment of a person who was a subject of two countries, he could not speak to such distinctions, because he did not understand them. But to admit that the distinction was a solid one, as applied to captain d'Auvergne, what could be said as to the case of captain Dumaresque, who was not a subject of France, but a native of Jersey or Guernsey? With regard to ministers not knowing of colonel Sebastiani's mission, till his report was published, he begged leave to refer them to one of lord Hawkesbury's letters, written antecedent to the publication of that report, in which letter they would find colonel Sebastiani and his mission mentioned. His lordship added one observation or two relative to the conduct of ministers, respecting the cession of the Cape of Good Hope, and concluded with repeating, that he should vote for the resolutions.

The house divided on the first proposition—Contents seventeen—Non-contents eighty-six.——The second and third propositions were likewise negatived.

The importance of the preceding debate, has induced us to treat it more copiously than our limits would properly admit, because the opinions of the great leading characters in the nation are expressed, upon one of the most eventful circumstances recorded in the page of English history. The powers of oratory, the exertion of talent, and the strength of reasoning were never more forcibly displayed: the opposition members strove by cogent and plausible arguments to convince the public of the incapacity of those who stood at the helm of the state; whilst the latter endeavoured to shew, that under existing difficulties, they had done all that was possible, and that no better measures, at that time, could be pursued, than those they had been obliged to adopt.

The very important debate in the house of peers on earl Fitzwilliam's motion of censure on ministers, was followed by a similar motion in the house of commons, by Mr. Patten, member for Newtown, Lancashire, and in the orations of the several speakers, we are led to admire the talents indicative of those who eminently interest themselves on great political questions which come before them; which shews that the members of the British senate are persons of the highest wisdom and penetration.

Mr. Patten called the attention of the house to his MOTION FOR CENSURING MINISTERS, and said he felt great regret that the task had not been undertaken by some gentleman more calculated to give to it the effect it deserved. It was now the third time that he had trespassed upon their indulgence. He had felt that in undertaking the review of the conduct of his majesty's ministers, he was justified by the opinion of the people of Great Britain, which left no doubt upon the subject. If gentlemen, said he, took the trouble to look to the commercial interests of the country, or to the transactions of monied people, they would find the suspense which prevailed fatal to every kind of commerce and speculation. They would find that trade was locked up in our ports, and that the spirit of enterprize, the great source of our opulence, was nearly, if not altogether, extinguished. But, it might be asked, why he undertook a task, to the execution of which, he candidly confessed himself incompetent. It was upon this ground, that gentlemen of great talents and rank, not only in the opinion of this country, but of Europe, had been accused of aiming, by their difference of sentiment from his majesty's ministers, at places and emoluments, and in order to prevent an accusation of so unworthy a nature from being in the slightest degree countenanced, he had come forward, and proposed the inquiry. He felt a grateful and honest pride in observing, that he belonged to no party, and that he could not be accused of having for his object, the gratification of personal or selfish feelings. It had been the cause of considerable alarm to the country, to hear that formidable naval armaments were carrying on in the ports of France; yet he had heard, that when lord Whitworth received his majesty's message to parliament, communicating that intelligence, his lordship did not know of any such armaments. That this was the fact, was confirmed by the statement of the first consul, and by the positive assurances of Talleyrand. He was also informed of the sentiments of an officer of great eminence in the civil line in France, who declared that the naval force preparing in the ports of the republic, was not sufficient for the wants and exigencies of the colonial service. He now came to a view of the papers and documents which were upon the table, relative to the late negociation, and the immediate causes of the present rupture. He could not conceive that there was a single man in that house, or in the country, with a spark of English spirit in his breast, or a drop of English blood in his veins, who was not satisfied that the first consul ultimately aimed a fatal blow at the ruin of our power and independence. But although this was a proposition which could not be controverted, it did not go to extenuate the measures pursued by his majesty's ministers, in their discussions with the government of France. The house was called upon to take into consideration the conduct of the king's ministers, as it arose out of the papers on the table; and the result was, that they had been kept in a continual state of aggression, insult, and degradation, by the first consul. After recapitulating the many points on which he wished to ground his censure, Mr. Patten concluded by stating that there were many other grounds, on the justice of which he might rest his charge against his majesty's ministers, but he should content himself with accusing them of withholding all communication from parliament; of suspending the functions of that house; of having issued such orders as they were not warranted to do, from their own knowledge and conviction; of compromising the honour and dignity of his majesty's crown; and of essentially injuring the interests of his people. He then read the resolutions he intended to submit to the consideration of the house:

"1. Resolved, That it appears to this house, from the declaration of his majesty, which has been laid before the house by his majesty's command, that the conduct of the French republic, since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, has been such as to be considered by his majesty's ministers as inconsistent with good faith, moderation, and justice, and as forming a series of aggression, pursued by France for the purpose of degrading, vilifying, and insulting his majesty's government.

"2. That his majesty's ministers have not since the treaty of peace to the time of issuing his majesty's declaration, neither communicated to parliament the real sense which they entertained of the system of conduct pursued by France, nor the steps taken by his majesty's government thereupon; and that they have thereby prevented this house from having the opportunity of properly discharging its real functions; and that by their having thus improperly withheld such communication, they have materially embarrassed the commerce of the country, deceived the expectations, and depressed the spirit of the people.

"3. That it was the duty of his majesty's ministers to embrace some more early opportunity of obtaining reparation for this country for the insults which had been offered to it by the continued aggressions on the part of France, and that such reparation was to be procured by dignified and temperate remonstrances; and that if such conduct had been pursued more seasonably, this country might have avoided the necessity of going to war, even before his majesty, by the reduction of his forces, had in a manner put out of his hands the most essential means of procuring reparation after the failure of all others; and that such a conduct, on the part of ministers, was a manifest neglect and omission highly injurious to the public interest.

"4. That it appears to this house, that upon the 4th day of October last, counter orders were issued by his majesty's government for the evacuation of the Cape of Good Hope, and that on the 16th of November, the spirit of France had been manifested by aggression, violence, and insults, for which no redress had been attempted to be obtained; that the Spanish and other priories had been withdrawn from the Order of Malta, and that Parma and Placentia had been added to the dominions of the French republic; Switzerland had been attacked, and the territory of the Batavian republic occupied by armies of the French government; that the first consul of France at the same time entertained all his plans relative to the Turkish empire, which appear from the papers before the house: and from all these circumstances it is evident, that by the evacuation of the Cape, during such transactions, his majesty's ministers have acted contrary to their duty, and have imprudently exposed to danger his majesty's government.

"5. That by all these instances of misconduct in the present ministers of his majesty's government, they have proved themselves unworthy of the confidence reposed in them, in such an important crisis as the present undoubtedly is."

After the first resolution was put, seconded by the right honourable T. Grenville, and read from the chair,

Mr. I. H. Browne observed, that the difficulties and dangers to which the honourable gentleman alluded, originated with the former, and not with the present administration. He did not think it right at this critical moment, when the honourable gentlemen themselves, and the house, all agree in the propriety of supporting the country against the dangers which threaten it, to interrupt the harmony and unanimity of the house, by any vote of censure on his majesty's government. He was well convinced, however, that the generality of the house was as unanimous against the first consul as he appeared to be determined against our enjoyment of the liberties of Englishmen. The conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, he thought praise-worthy in the present administration. While France continued to violate only the spirit of the treaty, he thought it most wise to avoid hostilities, if possible; but when she came to violate the letter, that was a point to stand on, there he thought it fit to rest, as, indeed, for every rupture of the kind it was necessary to begin at some point. He was decidedly against the motion, having never heard a speech of so great importance in its conclusion, and which contained so little to convince his judgement in the course of it.

Lord Temple said, it must be in the recollection of the house, that his majesty's ministers, since the ratification of the definitive treaty, on the 23d of April, 1802, until the 8th of March, when his majesty's message was communicated to parliament, did invariably hold out to the country the most flattering hopes, and he might add certainty of peace. How, he would ask, could they justify themselves for having done so? Had they not, and did not they offer as a justification, that the ambitious views, insults, and aggressions of France, since the signing of that disgraceful treaty, were a just ground of recommencing ing hostilities—did they not roundly declare, that it is indispensably necessary for Great Britain, even single-handed, to oppose the gigantic strides of the first consul? Peruse with attention the papers they had laid before the house, and it must appear, that his majesty's ministers were convinced, from the signing of the treaty, that it could not be executed. Notwithstanding the provocations, the injuries, and aggressions offered and committed by the first consul, ministers came down to the house and gave every assurance of the permanence of peace, although there was scarcely any ground subsequent to the 23d of October, that did not exist before that period, and consequently ministers must acknowledge, that they told what they did not believe, what could not take place, and what they were determined should not take place, namely, the execution of a treaty which had been already violated by the French government. But it was not until the report of colonel Sebastiani, that ministers seemed to take the alarm, and inform the country of the hostile intentions of the first consul. Was not the sending of commercial agents to this country antecedent and sufficient ground for war? Need he mention what had happened respecting the King George packet, on the 13th of October? Were we not given to understand that Holland was freed from the French troops? and on the 29th, Bergen-op-zoom and Breda were occupied by them; and, strange as it may appear, Mr. Liston wrote a letter, in which he recommended to leave them there, and this at a time when the annexation of that country to France was actually in the contemplation of the French government; all this was known previous to the 23d of November. But after all this, the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens comes to be considered, and it is found impossible to carry it into effect. It is discovered, that the general interests of the guaranteeing powers of all Europe, and of Great Britain in particular, render the execution of it, under existing circumstances, totally impossible. Ministers knew all this before the 23d of November, and determined to act upon it, and still the country was led to indulge the fallacious hope of peace. On the 27th of April, a Madrid Gazette had announced the annexation of the possessions of Malta in Spain by the government of that country; was not that a cause why the treaty could not be executed? But on the 22d of August, the noble secretary writes to the French government, informing it, that if the guaranteeing powers could be induced to accede to the wishes of both governments respecting Malta, there could be no further difficulties in the way of peace; and this was done at a time when sufficient ground for hostility had long before occurred; and when ministers knew that event, the tenth article of the treaty could not be carried into effect. His lordship then took a short view of the affairs of Switzerland, Holland, Turkey, and India; and proceeded by saying, on the 11th of March, Talleyrand tells lord Whitworth, that on the evacuation of Malta by the English troops depended either peace or war, and that the treaty of Amiens must be strictly executed. Was this information ministers were not prepared to receive? Did they not know long since that it would be impossible to execute it? And yet with all the grounds of war which he had already stated, arising out of the insults, ambition, and the infraction of the treaty, ministers did present an ultimatum as incapable of being executed on any permanent grounds, or with any hope of removing the feverish uncertainty which had pervaded the country, and depressed the spirit of commercial enterprize. What was this ultimatum? That this country might keep possession of Malta for ten years, during which time we should be colonising and improving Lampedosa, and enlarging its harbours; and at the expiration of that term, we should be requited with the sovereignty of that invaluable island, which would be the resort, not of seamen, but of sea-gulls. On the subject of the press, he felt like an Englishman, and hoped England would never be reduced to the necessity of regulating it to gratify any power. After a few other observations, his lordship concluded with observing, that it was manifest from the documents and papers submitted to the house, that his majesty's ministers had seen from the first moment that the treaty could not be executed; and he would not hesitate, therefore, to say, that they had shamefully sported with the feelings of the country, deluded it with false hopes, and abused its generosity. He charged them with not having remonstrated with the decision and energy which should characterize the ministers of this great nation. But he hoped, that after having the sad experience of two years of peace, as they were called, no person would be found so degraded as to sacrifice any longer at the shrine of such ministers; especially at this moment, when every thing which was held most dear and sacred might be at issue in the contest.

Sir William Young considered that the true policy of this country to be adopted towards France, was to view it as a great military republic, headed by a man too formidable and too eminent in enterprize, to be despised or disregarded; a man who, when he came to put into action his real designs, would not be found intoxicated with loose, vague, and undigested projects, but prepared to follow up his real plans with the most determined and desperate spirit. We must therefore be prepared against his attempts. It was of the very nature of a military republic to find constant employment for its troops; without this it must cease to exist; and thus, so long as France retained this form, it was immaterial whether Bonaparte, Moreau, or who else might be at her head; it would be her policy to vomit forth her troops upon every surrounding nation, which offered them enterprizes to interest their avarice or ambition. He concluded by voting for the resolutions.

Mr. T. Grenville said, that the motion had been ascribed to mean considerations of party spirit; to the mere wish of one set of gentlemen to drive others from confidential situations under government, with the view of occupying their places. For himself he most unequivocally reprobated such insinuations, and would not so far forget what he owed to the house and to his own character, as to make them the subject of any length of animadversion. It had been argued that the present was not the time for bringing forward resolutions of the nature which had that evening been submitted to the house. Of all the possible objections which could be urged, he said, he had no difficulty in saying that he considered this as one of the most extraordinary. He could hardly bring himself to believe that that evening he had heard it gravely stated, that by agreeing to the resolutions, or, even by pressing the discussion, information might be conveyed to the enemy. For himself, he was anxious that, at a moment when we were engaged in a contest in which great exertions and great sacrifices would be more powerfully required than in any former struggle in which the country was ever engaged, that an inquiry should be instituted into the capacity of those who were to direct the application of the national resources, and the national strength; to ascertain whether the battle which was to be fought, would be fought with proportionate energy and courage; to see that every department of the public service was properly administered; to take care, that if the country was to submit to extraordinary sacrifices, the exertions which were made were directed by those to whom all ought to look up with confidence. In this sense he certainly wished that the enemy and the people of Great Britain should be put in possession of that which it was the object of the resolutions to procure. Having said this, he would not pretend to deny that the object of the resolutions was to call in question the conduct of ministers throughout the whole of the negociations and discussions which had taken place between the two governments, from the time that the definitive treaty of peace was concluded. To have a full and fair view of this subject, it would, however, be in the first place necessary, briefly to advert to the situation of the country at the time when the treaty was concluded. By the second of the resolutions it was declared, that ministers had not made to parliament such full and ample communications as could lead to any estimate of the real situation of the country, and therefore the house was debarred of the constitutional right of giving any opinion on the state of public affairs. He was desirous of distinctly recollecting and stating to the house the views and expectations which had been held out at the time of the signature of the definitive treaty; and therefore referred to the language which had then been employed by the right honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when the merits of the definitive treaty were fully discussed (r). On that occasion he was among

(r) Mr. Grenville alluded to the debate on the 14th of May, 1802, when Mr. Addington made use of the following expressions, in answer to some arguments to prove that the peace could not possibly be of long duration:—"I am impressed with a thorough conviction that the peace which has now been concluded will, in all probability, be of as long duration as any of the pacifications concluded at various periods of the last century. I see nothing in the appearance of the present times, in the present government of France, or the character of the individuals of whom that government is composed, which at all induces me to think that the peace will not be lasting."

the

the small number of those who had uniformly argued in favour of the propriety of an address to his majesty, recommending an immediate settlement of the various points which the treaty had left open to discussion, and from which was anticipated a rupture at no very distant period, unless an adjustment was effected. This proposition had, however, been resisted by ministers and rejected by the house. What then was the state of the information which ministers communicated to parliament? The fact was, that no information of any kind was communicated to the last parliament after the signature of the treaty, except what was communicated through his majesty's gracious speech at the conclusion of the session. In that speech an expectation was certainly held out, that there was a prospect of the continuance of peace, and a recommendation was given to cultivate the advantage which a state of peace presented. With this general impression the last parliament was dissolved. He certainly had never heard it asserted, and he could in no case admit the position, that the prospect of a speedy dissolution of parliament at all lessened the obligation of ministers to communicate a full and fair explanation of the state of public affairs. In this state the matter continued till the opening of the new parliament (s), and then, as before, all communication was withheld. Here, however, it became important to inquire what were the facts which had occurred during the interval. When those who supported the resolutions contended that no information of the real state of the country was laid before parliament, at the opening of the session in his majesty's speech from the throne, they at the same time argued that every one of the grounds of war enumerated in his majesty's declaration had then taken place, and were as well known to ministers as at the period when the declaration was published. To shew that this assertion was well founded, he then directed the attention of the house to the principal grounds of complaint and aggression which the declaration contained. The first to which he adverted, was the molestation to which our commerce was exposed. From documents now on the table, it appeared, he said, that from December, 1801, to the same period in the following year, a series of these complaints had been preferred to ministers, and no spirited remonstrance had taken place on the subject. The visit of the military consuls was known before his majesty's speech was delivered, for it appeared by a paper which was laid before the house, that the instructions of Talleyrand to Fauvelet, who had been sent to take soundings of the harbour of Dublin, that they were dated at an early part of the month of November, and consequently were known to ministers when parliament was opened. That the designs of the first consul of France with respect to Switzerland was a matter of general notoriety. Ministers themselves had presented a remonstrance long before that period. With the annexation of Piedmont to France, ministers were not unacquainted. The confiscation of the revenue of the Spanish priories of the order of Malta, there was also every reason to think that ministers were acquainted with even before the definitive treaty was concluded. The mission of Sebastiani, ministers were fully apprized of long before they thought proper publicly to allude to it. They were not ignorant of the time when he left France, and on the 29th of November a dispatch from general Stuart announced his arrival in Egypt. Thus all the principal grounds of the declaration were perfectly well known to ministers long before the declaration made its appearance. He then alluded to the arrangement of the German indemnities, which to a considerable degree involved British interests. When he said this, he meant to allude to the insult which had been offered to his majesty, by mulcting a part of his Hanoverian dominions to satisfy the avarice of the greater powers. Complete mystery had almost wholly covered the whole business of the indemnities to the house of Orange. For this arrangement an article had been introduced into the treaty; but till the papers were laid on the table the house had been totally ignorant in what train the negociation on this subject had been left by ministers. The whole business about the order for the evacuation of the Cape, and its subsequent retention was entirely passed over in silence.

By papers subsequently called for, it appeared, that (t) ministers had dispatched orders to retain the Cape, though by a solemn treaty, it was to be given up within a limited period. Ministers, by this treaty, entered into a stipulation, which stated, that within a certain period the Cape should be surrendered to the Batavian republic. The treaty containing this stipulation had been laid before both houses of parliament, and had received their approbation. Under such circumstances, ministers had taken on themselves to violate a direct stipulation of the treaty. They had chosen to dispatch orders to suspend the execution of a part of it, and of consequence to declare the country in a state of war. At what time, he desired the house to consider, was it that this extraordinary step had been taken by ministers? It was just about one month from the time that parliament assembled: but they did not inform the house of the measure to which they had resorted? They had not said a single word on the subject. In a very few weeks after, it had appeared proper to them to evacuate the Cape, and then a war virtually intervened; still ministers continued to observe the same silence; and he believed, that if the negociation, which had lately terminated, had taken a favourable turn, we should have heard nothing of the whole of the orders and counter-orders of ministers; the whole would have been involved in the darkest obscurity. Every discussion would have been discountenanced by ministers, and conversation in the public prints would have supplied the place of official documents on a matter of the highest importance. He next proceeded to examine the grounds on which the third resolution was founded. From the two first resolutions, the third appeared to flow as a necessary inference. It involved a variety of serious and weighty observations. First, in the attacks which had been made on our ships by the officers of the French government. When the individuals complained of the injuries they had received, they were told to appeal to the national courts of justice. But what, he begged the house to consider, were these national courts of justice? The principal ground of complaint was, that these courts of appeal decide only by taking immediate possession of the prizes submitted to their decision. But what does the first consul say to the complaints of British subjects? Why, he tells them they must appeal to the tribunals, to the very tribunals from which all the injustice complained of had been received. Let justice take its course, is the language of the first consul; and the grossest injustice is the course which this pretended justice invariably pursues. The capture is divided, and the British claimant is forced to bear those losses, against which the remonstrances of ministers had failed to protect them. This was an outrage in all respects so gross, that ministers ought with much greater spirit to have resented the attempt to violate the usages of independent nations; but they had chosen to pursue a course totally different. No memorial could be laid before the house, not because they had not remonstrated, but because the remonstrance had taken place merely in a verbal conference with the French ambassador. This was an evil in diplomatic proceedings which was frequently attended with very serious consequences. It left too much dependant on memory, necessarily liable to considerable deficiency; or to be distorted by party prejudice or private interest.

The next point on which he wished to touch, was the situation of Holland. For his own part he considered the conduct of the French government to the Batavian republic, to be a full, fair, and unanswerable ground of war; but ministers had not shewn that zeal and activity with regard to the necessity of remonstrating against the violence and injustice of the French government to the Dutch, which their duty to the public imperiously called on them to display. Indeed their conduct was marked by weakness, irresolution, and timidity. It had been remarked by one honourable gentleman, that in making their stand for Malta, ministers had made their stand for a truly British object. When he considered the manner in which the stand was made, whatever he might think of the importance of Malta, he could not perfectly coincide with that sentiment. But even granting that Malta was a fair British object, he would ask whether there was any man who did not think that ministers ought firmly and manfully to have remonstrated against the continuance of the French troops in Holland. It was, he said, to his infinite astonishment, that he found that no memorial had been presented to the French government on the subject, though one had been drawn up with the view of being presented; which after being in the hands of our ambassador, ministers had at length discovered that it would be more wise that it should not be delivered. They declined interfering, on the base and dishonourable principle, that their interference might have excited the jealousy of the French government. Was such language to be endured in an English parliament? Was a British secretary of state to tell a British house house of commons, that a memorial drawn up in behalf of an ancient and valuable ally, in support of the independence of a power with which we have a mutual interest, should, from considerations of prudence, propriety, or wisdom, from a dread of irritating France, be cancelled or buried in oblivion. Such was the disgraceful picture which the conduct of ministers to the Batavian republic presented. Now, as to their conduct to Switzerland, he confessed that here too ministers seemed to be highly reprehensible. He had good reason, he said, for believing that as early as the spring of last year, several persons of eminent character, and invested with considerable situations, had come from Switzerland to London, with the view of consulting about the best means of providing against that interference of the French government in their internal affairs they had even then began to dread. He had heard that these individuals, so far from being received with favour or with kindness, that it was not till after a solicitation of nearly two months that they could gain admission to any one of his majesty's ministers. This was a circumstance of considerable importance, and he wished to point out particularly the application of this circumstance, as throwing light on the conduct of ministers. They must have known long before October, when their remonstrance in behalf of Switzerland was presented, what was the real situation of that country (u). In June, the fears, the wishes, and the views of the Switzers had been explained to them. He wished to know from ministers what circumstances existed to induce them to remonstrate in October, which did not operate with equal force in June? Were not the claims of the Swiss as powerful? Was there not then a much greater probability of successful resistance than at the time when the remonstrance was presented, when in fact that was done beyond the power of reparation, which it was the object of Mr. Moore's journey to prevent? The whole remonstrance evinced neither dignity nor foresight. It was equally destitute of policy, wisdom, or ability. But, there was another circumstance attending this remonstrance, to which he thought it might not be improper to call the attention of the house. The memorial had been presented to the French government on the 10th of October, and nothing more is heard of it till the 27th of February following, when lord Whitworth is instructed to demand an answer to the remonstrance. Was no inquiry made during the whole intermediate space, in what light the memorial was regarded by the French government? Was this a matter of such trifling importance, that ministers chose to overlook it? It was in fact a tacit mode of establishing what ministers could not but know was the avowed object of the ambition of the first consul? Ministers ought much earlier to have demanded explanation. But this was just a part of their general system. As to Piedmont, he had to offer a few observations. On a former occasion the situation of the king of Sardinia had given rise to a good deal of discussion. On the debates on the definitive treaty, when it was objected that no provision was obtained for that sovereign, a noble secretary of state (v) had said, that he had not only lost all right to interfere on his behalf on the part of this country, but had, from his conduct, placed himself in the situation of being considered as an enemy. Against such a view of the subject he did then and must at all times protest in the strongest terms. Because a prince who, fighting in our cause, had been stripped of his dominions, and deprived of his all, was for a while obliged to assume the nominal appearance of a foe, he could never admit the doctrines which the noble lord had laid down. But on a sudden a most important change is introduced in the situation of this sovereign. From being something little short of an avowed enemy, he is at once converted into a favoured ally, for whom ample security is to be obtained for all his losses. And how is this new indemnity to be procured? Why, by the rare scheme of the cession of Lampedosa, and by tacking the poor king of Sardinia to the end of the projet; which contains two articles that may be either admitted or not, as the French minister for foreign affairs chooses to receive them. Whether, however, the menace of war or the proffer of peace was considered, the whole conduct of ministers to that unfortunate prince appeared equally disgusting. Now as to the direct subject of Malta, he could not but think that a total want of policy with regard to Russia had been discovered by ministers, while negociations were going forward on this subject. Russia is allowed on all hands to have been the principal power on which ministers relied for the guarantee of Malta at the time the tenth article of the treaty was formed. Now, what happened while such was the avowed wish and design of ministers? Ministers signed a treaty, by one article of which Russia is to be invited to be one of the guarantees of the independence of the island of Malta; and this ministers did, while at the very moment they were making this requisition, they were conscious that such a guarantee would be directly contrary to a previous arrangement betwixt this country and Russia. [Here the right honourable member read an extract from count Woronzow's note on the 12th of November, stating this fact.]

(s) The 23d of November, 1802.

(t) On the 16th of October.

The history which he had now to present to the house on the subject of Malta, was short and simple, unless the note to which he had alluded was a direct forgery, which there was no reason whatever to suppose. The language of the emperor of Russia to the ministers of this country, or to the French government is—"You wish me to be one of the guarantees of Malta, agreeably to the tenth article of the treaty of Amiens, which I am far from wishing to undertake; but if I were willing, I cannot accept the invitation; it is not in my power, as you, the ministers of Great Britain, must be perfectly aware. You know that I have already entered into an agreement with your court relative to Malta, in its nature entirely contrary to the guarantee you require." Is it really true that the king's ministers knew that such was the situation of the emperor of Russia with regard to Malta; and did they really form an article, which they must have been conscious at the time could never be fulfilled. Those who objected to the article originally, did so on the ground of the difficulties which could not fail to attend its being carried into execution. How much stronger reasons had ministers to entertain such an opinion. They knew that it was contrary to the wishes of the emperor of Russia to undertake the guarantee. They knew that it was impossible he could, consistently with a former solemn engagement, undertake it, and yet with such knowledge they conclude the treaty, and gravely call for the guarantee. In the whole annals of diplomacy, he believed, it would be difficult to find any parallel to the conduct of ministers in this point; of a piece with this was the manner in which they had acted with respect to the sale of the priories of the order of Malta in Spain. They knew, that without revenues the restoration of the order was utterly impracticable, but, at the very time, when the definitive treaty was signed, they had every reason for thinking that in Italy, in Bavaria, and in Spain, the revenues of the order were either confiscated, or on the eve of being confiscated, in these several countries. After all this knowledge, they come forward and call for the guarantees, to pave the way for the restoration of the order. Such being the case, he could not conceive that ministers ever could have entertained the remotest idea of the restoration of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem in Malta? Before he concluded, he wished to occupy the attention of the house a few moments on the subject of the Cape of Good Hope. Of the importance of the Cape as a naval station, no diversity of opinion prevailed. All those whose habits of life led them to form the most accurate ideas of its value, were those who spoke most highly of its importance. It was merely with the view of an absolute necessity of its surrender at the conclusion of peace, that the cession was ever attempted to be justified. On this ground alone had the expediency of ceding the Cape been argued, both in the preliminary articles and the definitive treaty. With this impression on his mind, it was, he said, with no small degree of surprize, that he found, on referring to the French official papers, that the proposition for ceding the Cape originated with the ministers of this country; that it was brought forward even so early as the second conference. He begged leave to press this on the attention of the house, which, in the minds of many, could not fail to excite very considerable surprize. He recurred to the order for retaining the Cape, and on this subject he made some very pointed observations. It was generally understood the orders for the retention were sent out on the 16th of October, with reference to the prospect of a war with France, on account of her unjustifiable interference with Switzerland. If the interference of France with Switzerland was a just ground of war, the same interference with respect to Holland was a still more powerful reason for hostilities. If the occupation of Switzerland by French troops, was a fair ground of remonstrance, it surely was not less so with regard to Holland. Now, how did the case stand here? Ministers, on the 16th of October, dispatched orders to retain the Cape of Good Hope, under an apprehension of the renewal of war, on account of the unjust attempts of the French government to impose a form of government on the Swiss people. On the 14th of November they receive a dispatch from the British minister at the Hague, which gives them no room to entertain any hope of the French troops being speedily withdrawn from Holland. On receiving this intelligence, ministers did not discover new jealousy, nor adopt new measures of precaution. On the contrary, they sent out orders for the evacuation of the Cape! He desired the house to contrast this with the order of the same day on the preceding month, and then judge of the talents or the consistency of ministers. The right honourable gentleman, after recapitulating and enforcing all his arguments, sat down by giving his cordial vote for declaring his majesty's present ministers unworthy of the confidence of parliament, and unfit to manage the affairs of the empire at so perilous a crisis.

(u) In this remonstrance, dated October 10, 1802, and addressed to M. Otto, lord Hawkesbury acquaints that gentleman that he has received his majesty's commands to communicate, through his means, to the French government, the sentiments of deep regret which have been excited in his majesty's mind by the address of the first consul to the Helvetic people, which was published by authority in the Moniteur of the 1st instant. The remonstrance laments the convulsions to which the Swiss Cantons had for some time been exposed; but considered the late exertions of the Switzers in no other light than as the lawful efforts of that people to recover their independency, which the French nation had formally guaranteed to the Swiss nation by the treaty of Luneville.

(v) Lord Hawkesbury.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Addington) now observed, that were it not that several of the charges and observations that had been so forcibly insisted upon by the right honourable gentleman who spoke last, seemed personally to be directed against him, and that he was but too sensible of the weight they must carry with them when they come under the sanction and authority of his name, he should not have risen in the present discussion. But much had on the present and on former occasions been remarked upon the treaty of Amiens. He said, however, that he thought it was a measure not only wise, prudent, and necessary at the time it was adopted, but that it had since been productive of the most beneficial consequences; nor would he hesitate to affirm, that he should not have now to congratulate the house, and the country, on the spirit, the vigour, and the unanimity, which the present emergency had called forth, were it not for that very treaty which was so loudly arraigned and so severely stigmatized. Of the wisdom and beneficial consequences of that treaty, not only did he continue to retain a hardened sense, but was ready to affirm, that it was also wise and desirable to endeavour to maintain it, if it could be maintained consistently with the honour, the dignity, and the interests of the country. But since our anxious wishes in that respect had been frustrated, and war had necessarily arisen, he trusted he was prepared to meet the crisis with the feelings of an Englishman; and anxious as he was to sheath the sword, he should now be found no less determined to unsheath it, until it appeared that the honour of the country remained untouched, and that its safety and independence were more effectually secured..

He then adverted to the conduct of his majesty's ministers with respect to the French government; and observed, that it had been asserted, that in the discussion on his majesty's speech, on the 23d of November, an assurance was expressed by him, that there was no probability of a rupture. What he then said, was in answer to an honourable gentleman, who observed that he was concerned to see that it was likely hostilities would be renewed. All he asserted on the occasion was, that he saw no probability of an immediate rupture at that time. He was supposed to have observed that we were in profound peace; but he did not think that he made use of the word profound; and if he added the word profound, it was probably only from the usual combination of the two words. No other expression of the nature hinted at had escaped his lips. In another conversation, he was supposed to have said, that he had no expectation that the war would be renewed. What he said then, merely referred to the state of our national and military strength, which he asserted was not intended to answer any views of ambition and aggrandizement, but had only in contemplation the assertion of our just rights, and the maintenance of the blessings of peace. Ministers, he said, were also accused of not making formal communications to parliament of the matters that gave rise to the discussions. Such communications might be attended with the worst effects, and therefore it was prudent to withhold them until the time came for making them with safety. As to the application from Switzerland, it was true, that it took place before the meeting of parliament, but it was then earnestly wished that no resistance should be made on their part. Nor was there then any combination that could give any effect to a remonstrance in their behalf. When that combination afterwards took place, it was too late to make any successful remonstrance. With regard to Holland, the right honourable gentleman complained that strong and vigorous remonstrances had not been made for the removal of the French troops from that country. The contrary would appear from the instructions given to lord Whitworth. Hopes were given by Mr. Liston, on the 5th of November, that the French troops would evacuate Holland; but on the 12th that expectation was discouraged. The French government expressed a wish that the troops destined for Louisiana might continue some time longer in the Batavian territories; with which wish the Batavian government seemed disposed to comply; for they hinted a desire that we should forbear to interpose in their behalf. On the subject of the Cape of Good Hope (w), much had been said, and more value has been attached to that possession than, perhaps, it deserves. In his opinion, it was of much less value than other possessions which his majesty's ministers were anxious to retain; and in this opinion he had been confirmed by the concurrence of those who were best qnalified to decide upon that question. Besides, the retaining of it would involve a large expence; for during the time we were in possession of it, that expence amounted to no less than two millions. The right honourable gentleman in speaking of Malta, seemed to suppose that an engagement respecting it had been entered into with Russia; no such engagement had taken place, nor any thing approaching to it. Previous to the conclusion of the preliminaries, a communication had been made to the Russian government of the heads of the arrangement respecting Malta: and then no objection was made to the arrangement, except to that part which related to a Maltese langue. We afterwards, indeed, agreed to adopt the Russian mode of electing the grand master, and hopes were given by lord St. Helen's, that Russia would on her part consent to grant her guarantee, but these hopes were afterwards disappointed. With regard to the French commercial commissioners, and the intention with which it appeared that they were sent into the British dominions, his noble friend had remonstrated in the most spirited terms, and he received a disavowal of the purpose for which they were supposed to be intended. As soon as all hopes had vanished of concluding a commercial treaty, government refused to recognize them, and they were instructed to remove from the country. The only one of them who attempted to remain, was sent away from Jersey, by virtue of an order from the secretary of state's office; and an intimation was sent to general Andreossi, that unless they all withdrew, force would be employed to compel them. Ministers anxiously wished to preserve peace, but notwithstanding that anxiety, the honour of the country was never committed, as the documents on the table would abundantly prove. They would exhibit, indeed, strong marks of forbearance, but not one of unbecoming weakness. While there remained a hope of peace no communication was made to parliament, because it was thought, and he thought justly, that such communications would frustrate rather than promote the attainment of the desirable object. What the conduct of ministers had been throughout, he hoped, that the house had now before them full and ample communications, and he was ready to say, that in whatever light they might be induced to behold their conduct, ministers were ready to meet their decision. They only called for a decision; they did not venture to ask for approbation: they were anxious, however, to escape censure—if it were merited, they submissively acquiesced in the sentence of the house: but if it were unmerited, let their minds be relieved from the charges which the resolutions then proposed hung over them, and let them go unfettered to the discharge of those arduous duties of which they were desirous to acquit themselves with zeal, diligence, and fidelity. Let them know that they did not go forth in the eyes of the country branded with the stigma of the displeasure of the house; or, if they had unfortunately incurred their disapprobation, let it be proved by a direct charge; if the house said the charge was not founded, their gratitude would be unbounded—if they said it was, they should bow to the decision, with the consciousness of having exerted their best endeavours to have deserved a better fate.

(w) The Cape of Good Hope, the most famous place of traffic among the Hottentots, was discovered in 1493, by Bartholomew Dias, a Portuguese admiral, in the reign of John II. The admiral gave it the name of Cabo dos todos los Tormentos, or The Cape of great Sorrows, from the boisterous winds almost constantly roaring there. But the king, his master, changed the name to Cabo del Buonne Esperanza; the Cape of Good Hope; "because," said he, "there was now good hope of making prosperous voyages to the East Indies." This has continued its European name ever since. But the Portuguese never having made any settlement here, it remained unnoticed, except as an anchorage, till 1600, when the Dutch discovered it; but even they did not consider its advantages till, in 1650, Mr. Van Riebeck, a surgeon, found out what advantage the Dutch East India company might reap, if they encouraged the cultivation of the spot, and erected it into a settlement; his representations were sanctioned by government, and after many improvements it arrived at its ultimate importance. The settlement being firmly established, its population increased to such a degree, being joined by other settlers from Europe, that new settlements were extended along the coast, which at last were divided into four principal forts or towns, viz. The Cape, which is denominated the capital; Hellenbogesh; Drakenstone; and Waverish colony. The colony also purchased a large tract of land, called Terra de Natal, lying between Mosambique and the Cape; for which they paid in toys, &c. to the value of thirty thousand guilders, so that, with such an accession, the province became of great extent, and its government a considerable port. In the neighbourhood of the Cape are three remarkable hills; of which the highest is denominated Table Hill. On the tops of these are several springs of clear and wholesome water; and though at a distance, there is no appearance of fertility, at a nearer approach, the beholder is charmed with an abundant beauty of cultivation: the stately trees with which these majestic eminences are crested, are hardly discoverable but at an approximity. On Table Hill, are two groves, between which a silver-mine was discovered, which, it is the opinon of many, might be wrought to great profit.

nour

Mr. Pitt felt a considerable difficulty in giving a decided opinion, and the more especially so after the manly appeal of the right honourable gentleman who had just sat down, to the positive decision of the house. He then took a view of the subject in a masterly manner, and concluded by saying, if a certain portion of good was not to be obtained by any measure which was comparable to the mischief it might occasion, we should not lose a moment to enter upon the question, and to decide it at once. But he could not help thinking, that if they were instantly to enter upon a plan of enabling his majesty to carry into immediate effect those active and vigorous measures which might be necessary for the general welfare and security of the country—if they were to grant him a bill of supply for completing the ranks of our armies and other necessary establishments—which might give the most effective energy to the operations so necessary for us to carry on by sea and on land—these were objects by which they would sooner convince his majesty of their love and regard for his person, and their attachment to, and anxiety for, the honour and dignity of his crown, and the general welfare and prosperity of the nation, than by desiring him to dismiss his ministers, and shewing a want of confidence in those to whom he had entrusted the rule and guidance of his executive government. These were the sentiments which he felt, and therefore, without entering further into the motives for doing so, he should conclude by moving "that the order of the day be now read."

Lord Hawkesbury rose, evidently under considerable agitation. He said, that never before had he risen in parliament with such feelings as those that now oppressed him. With every wish to do justice to the motives of his right honourable friend, in making the motion with which he had concluded his speech, he and his colleagues should be shrinking from their duty to themselves, if they could accept the compromise offered, between a direct censure and a total acquittal. A charge of crimination, founded upon papers laid on the table, had been brought forward. He asked, if there was an instance in which propositions founded on such documents, and involving the conduct of ministers, had not been met either with a direct negative or affirmative? A motion of inquiry might be got rid of by a previous question; but when a direct charge was made, grounded on facts, arising out of public documents, a previous question was not the fit way of disposing of the subject. No man was more ready than he was to acknowledge the prerogative of the crown to chuse its ministers: but, on the other hand, ministers were responsible to parliament for the exercise of their functions, and when parliament saw sufficient grounds of censure, they ought to state it; and then ministers, no longer able usefully to serve the public, ought to retire. He wished that, on the present occasion, ministers might either be acquitted or condemned. He was sure, from what he knew of his right honourable friend, that his motives in bringing forward a previous question were pure and upright, but ministers could not acquiesce in the discredit of a suspended censure. If it were the desire of ministers to retain their places at all hazards, they might accept the compromise which had been offered, but he could say for himself and his colleagues, that they had no desire to remain in office longer than they could be useful to their country. If he felt himself reduced to that situation in which he could not serve it with advantage, he would carry the seals to the feet of his gracious sovereign, and intreat him to appoint a successor more worthy. It was that they might not remain in office discredited, and useless, that he must oppose the previous question; for he could not think of remaining an hour in office after having forfeited the confidence of the house, and the good opinion of the country. He therefore gave a direct negative to the previous question, as well as to the resolutions moved.

Mr. Canning took a retrospective view of the leading features of the debate, made observations on the several resolutions upon the table, and concluded in the following manner: he had said, that he was fully prepared to declare his entire assent to all, and every part of the resolutions upon their table. After the manner in which they had been argued by his right honourable friend Mr. Grenville, and the answer, if answer it could be called, which his able and perspicuous speech has received from the right honourable Mr. Addington, it could not be necessary, even if at that time of night, and after the turn which the debate had taken, it were possible for him to detain the house by any detailed argument, in support of the resolutions. With regard to the fourth resolution, as it had been so unanswerably argued by his right honourable friend Mr. Grenville, and as a reply to his statement—if reply there could be—yet remained to be offered on the part of ministers, he would not detain the house by entering into any additional argument. He would content himself with expressing his firm persuasion that the present ministers of Great Britain were the first statesmen who ever imagined that the most likely way of bringing to a happy conclusion any point upon which they intended to make a stand, was to put previously out of their hands all collateral means of pressing it to advantage; that when, from the beginning, they were determined to take their stand upon the article of Malta—not to surrender Malta directly to France, nor under any arrangement but such as should provide effectual security against France obtaining possession of it; when with this determination, they foresaw, as they must have foreseen, that the first consul was bent upon pressing the evacuation of that island under circumstances which could not fail to place it within his grasp; and when so determined, and so foreseeing, they had thought it right (for no matter what reason) to retain the Cape, or any other possession which had escaped the general surrender, it did seem to him to be the very height of inconsistency, weakness, and improvidence, not to have turned this possession of the Cape to the obvious advantage of which it was capable, that of making it tell upon the settlement of their other differences, and specifically upon that of the dispute respecting Malta. All the evils, whatever they were, attending the recapture of the Cape they had already incurred. They had by this act rivetted Holland in the chains of France. Subscribing, therefore, as he most cordially and implicitly did, to the truth of every allegation contained in the resolutions to which he had referred, he could have no hesitation in giving a hearty assent to that which was the natural and inevitable inference from the foregoing, the resolution which asserts, that by these instances of misconduct the ministers had proved themselves unworthy of the confidence of parliament, and incapable of administering the public affairs to advantage at a crisis of such difficulty and danger. In his conscience he fully subscribed to, and adopted, the averment of this resolution also: and with all the solemnity which he felt to belong to such a declaration, he declared in the face of that house and of the country, that he did not think the country safe while the administration of its affairs was suffered to continue in such hands. This was the opinion which he conscientiously entertained; which he had not formed lightly, but upon the best consideration that he was capable of giving to a subject of the highest and most aweful importance; and which having thus formed, and being thus convinced of its truth, he could not consent to abandon, or to abstain from affirming by his vote. To give this vote, he must, in the first instance, vote against the previous motion of his right honourable friend Mr. Pitt. It was with infinite pain he did so. But if all the pain which he felt in being compelled to take a course so new to him, was not sufficient to withhold him from the discharge of what he considered as an indispensible duty, it was not likely that he should be deterred from it by other considerations, which had been adduced that night, to deter gentlemen from expressing what they thought of the incapacity of the present administration. It had been imputed by more gentlemen than one, and among others, in a particular pointed manner by an honourable baronet (sir Thomas Metcalf) who sat near him, that those only wished to displace the present ministers, who looked for power, or emolument, or honours, from their removal. He was truly sorry that the honourable baronet should have been persuaded to join in this trite and vulgar cry, because he should be loth that any thing he might say should hurt his feelings, or derogate from the respect to which he believed his character to be entitled. But one general remark he must make, in answer to these imputations, that he believed those only to be capable of seriously imputing such motives of conduct to others, who were conscious of being actuated by similar motives themselves.

which

The Secretary at War (the honourable Mr. Yorke) called for a decisive vote, on the same grounds with his colleagues. He said that the militia, and a certain portion of the army had been disbanded on peace; but that the military force of this country was never in a better state than it was at present. He defended the conduct of the admiralty. He shewed that we had a naval force in every quarter superior to the enemy; and in Europe superior to that of the French by a much greater proportion than had ever happened on the breaking out of any war.

The house then divided—Ayes for the order of the day fifty-six; Noes against it three hundred and thirty-three.

The house then resumed; Mr. Pitt and several of his friends immediately went out; and afterward the question being put on the original motion;

Mr. Fox said, that it was not his intention to vote for the resolutions, though, at the same time, it was impossible for him to approve of the conduct of his majesty's ministers. He had expressed his opinion upon a former occasion, and he conceived that the time was past for moving a vote of censure on their conduct upon the present subject. Yet he hoped that what had occurred would be a warning to them how they kept the house in future in the dark to the last moment. Mr. Fox concluded by paying some warm compliments to Mr. T. Grenville upon his masterly speech, and by saying that he could not agree to a vote of censure, because he did not know but that the successors of the present ministry might be more objectionable to him than the present—After which a division took place upon the original motion of colonel Patten—For it, thirty-four; Against it, two hundred and seventy-five (x).

Thus have we brought to a conclusion our summary of these very important debates, which will be read with attention by all who wish to ascertain the state of party at this time; the house of commons having presented a new appearance. It must be remembered, that when Mr. Pitt went out of office, he unequivocally promised his cordial support to his successors; this promise he had strictly abided by till now, when his behaviour appeared truly paradoxical. He could not agree in a vote of censure against ministers—nor could he approve of their conduct. He did not offer a single reason for his not approving of the measures of the ministry—and yet he moved the order of the day. Such versatility appears unaccountable, and indeed lord Hawkesbury conceived it so, when in his reply his agitation was observable by every member. Making due allowance for what was due to the delicacy of old friendships, a career of opposition could not be opened in a more decided manner. The arguments urged against the ministry, of having too long neglected to arrest the arm of consular aggression, were such as shewed their repugnance to go to war, if any other means could be used to prevent it; this, in a country where commerce flourishes by amicable arrangements, must endear them to the public and every lover of peace: had not ministers acted as they did, and waited till the measure of the French iniquity was complete, they would have merited disapprobation for so soon involving the country in a needless war, merely to satisfy some diplomatic minutiæ.

From appearances at this time, it was evident, that some change was in agitation; and as doubts had always arisen concerning Mr. Addington's elevation to power; some considering it as purely independent, and unconnected with any part of the preceding administration; whilst others as confidently insisted that he was merely the automaton of Mr. Pitt; and in this opinion were the majority of such as considered themselves competent to judge of the various movements in the political measures of the cabinet. These circumstances, however, were very soon discredited, when ministry took a step which convinced the country of its independence and its decision. This was the appointment of Mr. Tierney, to the lucrative post of treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Tierney had been popular during the former administration for his decided opposition to all their measures; of a bold and determined spirit; and with abilities adequate to such a disposition, he had, by means of the union of extraordinary talents, been a source of uneasiness to them in all their proceedings. His appointment, therefore, was a proof, that, however the former connexion had subsisted, this step was an act of separation as great as it was unexpected, and though Mr. Pitt's observations in the house might apparently be a disavowal of the partnership, if any existed, this act did not fail effectually to widen the breach.

The friends of Mr. Pitt might have conceived, that the difficulties under which the country now laboured, were only to be met by the wonderful abilities, which it must be allowed by all parties, and has never been denied by any, he certainly did possess. Mr. Fox's admirers drew the same hopes of their favourite, as resulting from the same cause; but the promotion of Mr. Tierney was a convincing proof, that the minister thought he could have a sufficient reinforcement of talent without the assistance of either party. Mr. Tierney stood independent: he had long seceded as a member of the Whig Club; or, as they wished to insinuate, they had shaken him off; he therefore went into office without friends, or any weight of influence, except brilliant talent, as a mere individual, and without any other recommendation. Ministers, therefore, made no acquisition of power by means of his appointment; which, when announced, immediately extinguished the hopes of the leading parties. The consequence was, that Mr. Pitt immediately and unequivocally disowned the minister; whilst the Ponsonby interest, and the other friends of Mr. Fox, retired from public business in disgust; they determined to await a fortuitous turn in the cabinet, to accomplish which, if possible, and, not to forfeit their hopes by precipitation, they resolved not to take a decided part either for or against the minister.

Mr. Tierney also did not escape the censure which it was imagined his desertion from his former professions, as it was called, had entailed upon him. His seat in parliament, upon his acceptance of the treasurership having been declared vacant, a powerful opponent appeared to dispute his further claim on the electors of Southwark. Sir Thomas Turton, a magistrate, and a person of great interest, declared his determination to canvas the suffrages of the electors against one who had so flagrantly deserted his constituents. He took a general review of Mr. Tierney's conduct, and the principles upon which he had been considered a fit person to represent the Borough; and he adverted to a book, formerly written by a friend of Mr. Tierney, in explanation of his principles and conduct. Having quoted many passages from it, he begged leave to ask, whether Mr. Tierney could possibly be considered the character he was described? Could he pretend to say it was in his power now to vote on any question with the opposition? Could he sit in any part of the house of commons, except upon the treasury bench; or, could he vote otherwise than with the minister? He considered that Mr. Tierney had forfeited all claim to the favour of the electors of Southwark, and he trusted, that, as that gentleman had become an apostate from the principles he had once professed, he had forfeited the title by which he had been recommended. Mr. Tierney had formerly professed himself the champion of peace and parliamentary reform; but he had now come forward as the champion of war, for, as treasurer of the navy, he must necessarily have an interest in the continuance of the war; and he doubted not, but he would soon come forward as the champion of corruption.

To an address so pointed and so personal, Mr. Tierney made an excellent and judicious reply; and after a most illiberal, and personal contest, which disturbed the peace of the inhabitants for nine days; and was productive of more rancour, than is consistent with the regulations of a populous borough, in the neighbourhood of a polished metropolis, Mr. Tierney gained a majority, and was consequently re-chosen.

The recal of lord Whitworth, the opinions in parliament, and (x) Mr. Fox and several of his friends retired without dividing.

and the other testimonies of a rupture with an inveterate foe called forth the sentiments of the whole kingdom; addresses from all quarters approached the royal presence with assurances of unqualified loyalty and attachment; but none were more pointed in their expressions than that of the city of London; and, on the 8th of June, the lord mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, common council, &c. of the city of London, presented an address to his majesty, on the throne; in which they said, they begged leave to approach the throne, at this important crisis, with renewed sentiments of fidelity and allegiance to his majesty's person, crown, and government. "We are, continued they, fully persuaded of the necessity for the decisive and dignified measures adopted by your majesty, by the recal of your majesty's ambassador from France, and the vigorous posture of defence of the united kingdom to repel the designs of that government, whose inordinate and insatiable views of restless ambition are manifestly directed to overthrow the glorious constitution of these realms, and give a mortal stab to our existence as a free and independent nation. The justice of your majesty's cause, and the moderation of your claims, must be felt and acknowledged by every surrounding power; and we are convinced that the brave and happy people of this land, conscious of the purity of their freedom, and the inestimable privileges they enjoy under your majesty's mild and paternal rule, will with one hand and heart, resolve to defend and maintain them. Your majesty's faithful citizens of London feel a grateful pride in this assurance of kindred loyalty throughout your majesty's dominions, and are deeply sensible of the eminent distinction they are invested with, by this opportunity of testifying their fidelity and attachment to their beloved sovereign."

His majesty's answer to the address was dignified but moderate; and, according with the measures of his ministers, did not wish hostility, if peace was possible to be maintained.

The inhabitants of Ireland also stood forward on this important occasion. The meeting of the principal inhabitants of Cork, voted an address to his majesty, expressive of fervid loyalty to the constitution, and of abhorrence to the tyranny which provoked, by a series of offensive aggressions, the necessity of vindicating the honour, and securing the interests, of the British empire. But there was a new and a noble feature in the address, which enhanced even the value of loyalty, because it carried with it the means of making it effective, and competent to our crisis. It spoke the language of unanimity among Irishmen, of a reconciled and national spirit, in the place of alienation and animosity, and of the reality of that redemption of the Irish character from the little considerations of party, to the broader and prouder views of their common country, the meeting exhibited proofs at once convincing and delighting. An address was presented to the lord lieutenant, justly expressing how much his mild and liberal administration had done, in effecting that national reconcilement which inspired the conduct of the meeting.

Although the city of London presented the address just mentioned, she thought it highly necessary to oppose every proceeding which seemed to encroach on her privileges, or the rights of the country.

Mr. Addington in his budget, had introduced a modification of the Income Tax, at five per cent. and upon this tax he had said, "that he must make a distinction between that species of property, the value of which, to the owner, did in no degree depend on skill, talents, and industry, and that species of property, which wholly depended upon personal industry and exertions: under the first head, he included land and funded property. These, he said, must be relieved from disclosure; but that all persons carrying on trade, engaged in professions, or living by personal exertions, must be brought under the inspection of commissioners." Such a tax, under such circumstances, created just cause of alarm, because it was evident that the power given of an inquisition into the private finances of individuals, must be pregnant with incalculable evils.

The proposal of this odious tax was inexcusable, inasmuch, as it was not merely unjust by its liability to evasion; it was unjust in its very principle; income not being the criterion by which to judge of a man's ability to pay taxes; nor, probably, might his income be proportionable to his riches. Therefore, to tax men according to their income, was evidently one of the most unequal measures, and of consequence one of the most unjust things that could be attempted, especially in a free country (y).

It should also be considered, that industry is subject to many casualties, it may be suspended by sickness; and sickness may unfit even a young man from exercising his faculties to the last moment of a long life; industry is also liable to mental as well as bodily imbecility; besides, the changes which go on without intermission in human affairs, often diminish the productive powers of industry. An income under all these casualties, dependent upon the industry of an individual, must be worth less than an annuity dependent upon his life, whether arising from landed or other property. The worth of the one would be ten years purchase, that of the other would not be more than seven or six. If therefore a man whose income did not rise to more than six years purchase, was compelled to pay a tax equal probably to him whose income was even at forty years purchase; very little need be shewn how detestable must be such a system!

So corrupt, indeed, was this tax considered, that had it been solely levied upon landed property, it would have been held unequal and unjust; it therefore agitated the minds of all ranks, but of none more than those attached to trade and commercial concerns: in consequence of such agitation, a numerous and respectable meeting of merchants, bankers, and others, disapproving of the income tax, was held at the London Tavern, on the 23d of this month, for the purpose of devising the most effectual means, that a tax so noxious should not pass into a law.

Timothy Brown, esq. being called to the chair: Mr. Travers, an eminent merchant, opened the business: "He said, he had thought it his duty to convene this meeting, in consequence of the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of his intention to revive that odious tax, called the Income Tax, against which they had protested more than twelve months ago. The chancellor of the exchequer, impressed with their strong objections against the bill, thought proper to meet their wishes. He repealed the bill; a measure that spread universal satisfaction throughout the country. This was unnecessary for him to prove, since even the commissioners of the income tax, many of whom he was acquainted with, had assured him, that if the tax had not been repealed they would have resigned their offices, which were so unpleasant to them, and so repugnant to their feelings of the liberty which distinguished the British nation, and constituted the pride and glory of the country. He did not think such a tax would again have been resorted to; he had given the chancellor of the exchequer credit for being a man of more judgement: he knew he was a man full of the best intentions, and he therefore could not suppose he would have attempted to revive a tax which would have the effect of rendering the war unpopular. It was a tax which would unnerve and unbrace the energies of the country. The moment he found the chancellor of the exchequer had announced his intention, he wrote to Mr. Vansittart, urging him to state his objections; but unhappily the measure was in such a state of progression, that as he expected no answer, so he received none. Not discouraged, he had on Saturday last written a long letter to the chancellor of the exchequer, in which he stated all the objections that occurred to him against the tax. He in answer had a letter from Mr. Hobhouse, informing him he had received from the chancellor of the exchequer, an important communication touching the income tax. This he should lay before the meeting; but previous to his doing so, he thought it expedient they should enter their protest against this unconstitutional tax, in order that it might make a lasting impression on the country. He hoped the resolutions he intended to submit would be circulated from John (y) Suppose, for instance, one man derives five hundred pounds per year from his industry, and another should derive five hundred pounds per year, from a landed estate. Are these men equally rich? The man who has the estate, can enjoy his income during his life; and at his death, the estate can be sold for twenty thousand pounds. The five hundred pounds per year, obtained by the industry of the other, would fall at his decease; consequently he must be poorer than the former, by the same sum of twenty thousand pounds. This man who possessed the estate, might live up to his income, and leave ample provision for his family; but he who is compelled to live by his industry, and derives his income from it, ought every year to reserve a part of that income for the benefit of his children. How intolerable then would it be, if government should tax his income equally high with that of the man whose estate was a sufficient provision for his family. The former, with the most persevering economy, must still leave a property greatly inferior to that of the man with the estate. Were he to put by his whole income as long as he lived, still he must leave much less than he who possessed the estate. Could there be more injustice than to tax these men equally?

O'Groat's House (the farthermost house in Scotland) to the Land's End in Cornwall. He would not detain them further, but would read the thoughts he had committed to paper, and then propose them as distinct resolutions. He had at first framed these resolutions in the form of a petition, but Mr. Smith, one of the members for Norwich, had informed him, that a petition against a money bill would certainly be rejected, even though it should come from the city of London in its corporate capacity. The general scope of his resolutions was to this effect:—"That in the present critical juncture of public affairs, they felt the greatest repugnance to objecting to any tax imposed by the legislature, as they were convinced of the indispensible necessity they lay under to contribute largely towards the expences of the war in which the country was engaged; at the same time they thought it their duty publicly to express their opinion respecting the intended tax on income: first, as to its principle, that it was founded in error, inasmuch as the abilities of persons to pay the tax ought not to be measured by their income, but by the claims on it. One man was possessed of two hundred pounds a year, with a large family; another had two thousand pounds a year, without any family at all. Would any one say that it was a fair mode of taxation, to make each of these pay five per cent. on his income. One man derived his income from land, another from trade, another from salary, another from short annuities;—was it fair that all these should be equally taxed? Another objection arose from the difficulty of collecting the tax. Commissioners might be appointed, but no man could ascertain the exact amount of every person's income; it would consequently operate as A TAX ON HONESTY. The next objection was, that it created a temptation to evasion, and tended to dissolve the great moral obligations by which society were bound together. But the most weighty objection was, the manner of collecting the tax. The summary jurisdiction of a board of commissioners, furnished with unconstitutional powers, were degrading to the country, and hostile to the feelings of the people. For these, and many other obvious reasons, he wished the meeting to declare their disapprobation of the tax on income, as one which no modification whatever could rectify, and that the passing it into a law would be both unjust and impolitic." Such was the tenor of the resolutions he meant to submit to their consideration, alteration, or explanation.

He then proposed to put the meeting in possession of the letter from Mr. Hobhouse, on the part of the minister, which was accordingly read by the chairman.

Mr. Waithman said, they were met for the purpose of endeavouring to prevent the introduction of a tax called the Income Tax, which had been some time ago repealed. He had attended to the long resolution read, but it did not seem to him to come up to the grand and principal objection to this noxious and unjust tax. It was unjust to tax that income, which might have a limited duration, in the same proportion as that which was permanent, and was produced from funded or landed property. It was not the wish of the citizens of the metropolis to be excused from paying their taxes; but they objected to being placed in a state of degradation, which no Englishman ought to submit to. It seemed to be considered as a promise to relieve persons engaged in trade. He did not view it in that light; all that was asked of the chancellor of the exchequer was to impose his taxes fairly, that every one might pay his just proportion, and not introduce those which violated the freedom of the constitution. He conceived the whole of the measure was brought forward as if with a view to irritate the feelings of the public. It was truly said, great exertions were necessary, but surely no consideration ought to deter them from opposing a tax of such pernicious tendency. Having stated some further objections, he said he should propose a few plain resolutions as amendments to those which had been submitted. He concluded by moving, "That it appears to this meeting, that notwithstanding the manifest injustice, vexation, and oppression, occasioned by the late tax upon income, it is proposed, by a bill now depending in parliament, to revive the same partial and obnoxious impost." This resolution was passed unanimously. He next moved, "That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the revival of this tax is highly dangerous and impolitic; and that the arbitrary, inquisitorial, and unconstitutional power, necessary to render it efficient under any modification, would be outraging the public feeling, and endangering the peace of the community." Which, after some debate, was carried by a great majority.

Determined not to let a matter of such vast national consequence, be dropped for want of formality; a decided opinion was given against it, at a common hall of the livery of London, on the 29th of the same month. But though apologies have been attempted for the income tax; and though the commercial may be said to be levied with liberality, &c. yet, when the inquisitorial part of the question is suggested, as with great propriety it may, when so much power is placed in the breasts of commissioners and inspectors, who, possessing the passions similar to their fellow creatures, might be induced to exercise that power to the disadvantage of interests, which but for such interference, might have insured unsullied and unbounded credit.

The vigour which government thought it necessary to exert, now began to prevail. Forty thousand additional seamen, including eight thousand marines, were voted in the house of commons for the year 1803; making an aggregate of seventy thousand. The Gazettes constantly announced the bravery and intrepidity of the British sailors; several valuable prizes were brought into English ports; the capture of which developed Bonaparte's motives for prevarication in his various answers; it was evident, that he wished by delusive representations to prolong the negociation, till he had secured the property of his subjects; one month longer would have effected his purpose; but the forbearance of the British government had been exhausted, its resentment superseded its former moderation, and the first consul found the danger of insulting a nation, which might have been, had his measures been honourable, a powerful friend and ally.

The gallantry evinced in a petite expedition against the French coast, renders it worthy of preservation:—the Blanche frigate, commanded by captain Mudge, being upon the coast of Havre, took a small fishing-boat: it immediately occurred to the first lieutenant, Mr. Fromow, that something might be done to annoy the enemy even with this; and he not only proposed to fit her up as a gun-boat, with a twelve-pound carronade, but also volunteered to take the command of her himself. Four seamen, four marines, Mr. Lockyer, master's mate, and Mr. Bettesworth, midshipman, made up the crew. Thus provided, they immediately sailed into the harbour of Havre, and came to an anchor about five in the morning, determined to brave every event to which fortune might expose them. They had not been long in this situation, before they saw a sloop, deeply laden, making for the harbour. They attacked and immediately carried her, and Mr. Bettesworth, with two men, being placed aboard, was directed to proceed to the frigate, then at a distance in the offing. This transaction being perceived by the people of Havre, a brig mounting sixteen guns, lying in the harbour, was ordered to slip and chase; and coming within pistol-shot, opened a heavy fire of grape-shot upon the boat; her sails were torn, and her hull was shattered; but fortune preserved the lives of the gallant men on board. Not at all discouraged by the inequality of the contest, they kept up a brisk and determined fire with their carronade upon the brig, beat in her quarter, and as she was crowded with men who volunteered for the occasion, such a well directed fire had considerable effect. This action continued with equal ardour on both sides, till the frigate, having heard the cannonade, and made sail towards the harbour, checked the impetuosity of the Frenchmen, who, consulting their own safety, left the boat with her prize, and made the best of her way into Havre.

Catwater, the eastern arm of Plymouth, now displayed an interesting spectacle, it appeared a forest of prizes; so that there was scarcely room for passage-boats. The number of French prizes and Batavian ships sent into this port, in the course of only three weeks, amounted to the astonishing number of one hundred and five sail, of all descriptions; the computed value of the ships and cargoes, could not be less than one million and a half sterling (z). Orders, however, were sent to liberate the masters, mates, and crews of the Batavian ships, which it had been found necessary to detain; they had each a change of linen and clothes, with freedom to go home when they pleased. This liberality, so unexpected, operated upon them to such a degree, that most of them entered on board the king's ships or privateers.

(z) Many of the Batavian cargoes, cost in Batavia, from forty thousand pounds to sixty thousand pounds each, besides private ventures; a circumstance unparalleled in this or any former war; for besides the loss of private vessels, a considerable defalcation in the revenues of France and Holland, must have been sustained by the non-payment of the duties on importation.

such

The naval department of the country was in continual requisition: seamen were drafted from smaller to larger ships, which were prepared for sea with alacrity; indeed all classes were engaged in some project to defend their own and to annoy the enemy's shores; under all these circumstances of dispatch, no confusion, no precipitation seemed to pervade the proceedings of those concerned; every thought, every project seemed well weighed, and only calculated to display perseverance in the government, and confidence in the people.

The moderation constantly exhibited by the British government in all its measures was also manifest at this time by the publication of a state paper, on the 24th of May, addressed to Citizen Vander Goer, secretary of state for foreign affairs, at the Hague: it breathes no rancour; it does not attempt to arrest the feelings; but merely states such facts as convince without resorting to logical premises.

A measure of the greatest national import took place during this period, in which the trade and navigation of the country were incalculably interested. In a committee of supply, in the house of commons, the sum of twenty thousand pounds was granted towards making a navigable canal through the highlands of Scotland from sea to sea. The extent is fifty-nine miles, twenty-nine of which are occupied by lakes of unfathomable depth. The remaining to be twenty feet deep, and of a proportionate breadth, so that ships of the line may pass from the Baltic to the British Channel. Such a plan would obviate all the difficulties of going round about by the Shetland and Orkney Isles; a passage of fourteen days in the calmest weather, and which, in the windy season, is rarely effected in less than three months: while, by the proposed canal, the passage in the most unfavourable weather, would not occupy more than twelve days, and frequently little more than half that period. The whole expence of this canal was calculated not to exceed the loss sustained by shipwrecks, in the present course of navigation, in five years.

But as a very disagreeable counterpart to such a beneficial proceeding in one part of the kingdom; a species of peculation was discovered which ought to redound to the shame and reproach of those concerned. The first report of the commissioners for inquiring into the abuses of the navy having been published, it appeared, that the naval storekeepers in Jamaica had been accustomed for a long time preceding to purloin the premium on bills of exchange, instead of carrying it to the credit of government. For this misconduct the storekeeper was removed from the office in 1795, and succeeded by another, who was also charged with having continued the practice of his predecessor. Of the extent of this depredation an idea can be formed, when it is considered that from 1793 to 1800, the public lost, by the premiums on bills drawn on the navy board by the store-keeper, not being carried to account, the sum of fifty-three thousand six hundred and twenty-five pounds, while other nefarious practices by the same person, during the above period, would have made the whole loss amount to one hundred and thirty-four thousand five hundred and fifty-seven pounds if the difference had been equal between the prices abroad and at home. A prosecution was commenced against the store keeper who held the place since 1795; and who was also charged with circulating false coin on the island to a great amount.

While the inhabitants of Great Britain were consolidating their strength, and preparing the most powerful means of resisting invasion, Bonaparte was not inactive on the continent.

The British cabinet had observed the greatest moderation respecting his majesty's German dominions, and it had been considered as being in no manner involved in any part of the disputes between this country and France. The French consul, however, conceived otherwise; and ordered his general Mortier to march from Coeverden, where he had established his head-quarters, and to enter the electorate of Hanover. But that every measure which he undertook might have, at least, the appearance of consistency, the entrance of the French army into the Hanoverian territories was preceded by what was termed a proclamation, containing an invective against the king of Great Britain, and a comparative eulogy on the political and warlike virtues—the moderation—the humanity of the first consul.

On the 31st of May the French army had arrived before Wechte; when dispositions were made for attacking general Hammerstein, who was stationed at Diepholtz, with the Hanoverian advanced guard. The French advanced guard, under general Drouet, on the following day, had a smart skirmish with the rear guard of the Hanoverians, near Bauven; and on the 2d of June, the French army having joined, an attack took place near Bersten: when, after a warm cannonade, the French hussars broke the line of the Hanoverian dragoons, and were pursuing them, when the civil and military deputies from the regency of Hanover presented themselves at the advanced posts of the enemy; they requested them to suspend their march, and informed them that they were ready to offer advantageous propositions, but general Mortier refused to listen to any proposals, unless he was put into immediate possession of the whole electorate of Hanover. After a long discussion, it was agreed between the civil and military deputies of the regency of Hanover, and lieutenant-general Mortier, commander-in-chief of the French army, that Hanover should be occupied by the French army, and likewise the fortresses dependent thereon; that the Hanoverian troops should fall back behind the Elbe, and not bear arms against the French army or their allies, so long as the war should last between France and England; that the artillery, powder, arms, and ammunition of every kind should be placed at the disposal of the French army; that all the effects, of whatever kind, belonging to the king of England, should be left at the disposal of the French army; that the general in chief should have the power of making in the government and in the authorities constituted by the elector, such changes as he might think fit; that the whole of the French cavalry should be mounted anew at the expence of Hanover; that the electorate should likewise provide for the pay, the cloathing, and the provision of the French army; that the revenues of the country, arising both from the electoral dominions and the public contribution, should be at the disposal of the French government; and that the commander-in-chief should raise upon the electorate such contributions as he might deem necessary for the wants of the army.

This convention, which placed Hanover in the hands of the French, was signed at Sublingen, on the 3rd of June, 1803, by lieutenant-general Mortier, on the part of France, and by F. de Bremer, judge of the electoral court of justice, and provincial councellor, and G. de Boch, lieutenant-colonel, commander of the electoral regiment of guards, on the part of Hanover.

The Hanoverian minister, previously to this transaction, had furnished a communication to the Diet, that the elector, his master, had determined to observe the strictest neutrality in the war betwixt England and France, and therefore called on the Diet, in conformity to the treaty of Amiens, to interfere for the protection of the electorate from the invasion of the French troops. The other ministers took this declaration ad referendum. It was, however, generally understood, that the ministers of Prussia, Austria, Bavaria, and Wurtemberg, the arch-chancellor, &c. had in private declared, that they regarded the contest betwixt France and the minister of Hanover, as well as the neutral occupation of the states of the king in Germany, as a matter totally foreign to the interests of the Germanic empire; therefore they could not see in what way the emperor and the empire could interfere in behalf of the electorate.

At the time of the French invasion, the military force of Hanover amounted to thirty thousand men; but there was not a single fortified place of strength within the whole territory, sufficient to impede for any considerable time, the progress of the French army, consequently it was no very difficult matter for general Mortier to become master of the whole country, and in particular of the mouths of the Elbe and the Weser (a). "I have issued orders," says this general, "to seize all the vessels on those rivers."

"The

(a) As the rivers Elbe and Weser will be frequently mentioned in the account we have to give of the present war, it may be necessary to observe, for the information of our readers, who are not acquainted with geography, that the Elbe rises in the confines of Silesia and Bohemia, and running south to Konigsgratz in Bohemia, bends its course afterwards north-west, till it receives the Mulda below Prague; then running northerly, passes through Saxony, visiting Dresden, Messin, and Wittenberg, and afterwards Magdeburg: then running north-east, through Brandenburg, it receives the river Havel, after which it divides Lunenburg from Mecklenburg; then steering between Bremen and Holstein, visits Hamburg;

"The duke of Cambridge," says Mortier, "son of the king of England, and governor of Hanover, thought proper to take himself away before the battle, and to retreat by post. He had indeed previously promised to die with the levy en masse. It is probable he will have embarked before we reach the mouth of the Elbe." But the duke of Cambridge was with, and commanded the Hanoverians, during two slight skirmishes that took place, in which both parties had some wounded, and one or two men killed; immediately after which, the duke received an express from the regency, requesting his presence at Hanover, on business of the utmost importance. His royal highness, in consequence of this message, immediately attended. After being informed that all hopes of assistance or mediation were at an end, and that the regency were on the point of signing a capitulation, they begged his royal highness would not lose a moment in resigning, and quitting the country, as otherwise he must be made a prisoner of war (b).

On the 11th of June, the French army entered the city of Hanover, and general Mortier notices on this occasion, "That the most exact discipline had been maintained; and that two soldiers of the forty-eighth demi-brigade, convicted of having abandoned themselves to pillage and other excesses, had been shot." In the metropolis of the electorate, the enemy found fifteen thousand new muskets, five thousand pair of pistols, sixty new ammunition waggons, one hundred pieces of artillery, a bridge equipage adapted to the passage of the Elbe, magazines filled with powder, a foundery in the best condition, and completely furnished. According to the inventory of the pieces which were found in La Place d'Hameln, there were sent to the French army more than five hundred pieces of cannon. The park of field-artillery of the army of Hanover, which is at Zell, was delivered to general Dulauloy, commandant of artillery, and was composed of forty field-pieces, and two hundred caissons, all drawn by good horses. The infantry was stated at twenty-six battalions, of five hundred men, including officers; making from eleven to twelve thousand men, and the cavalry at twenty-two squadrons, forming in all more than five thousand men. The inventories arrived from the different places of Hanover, amounted to more than four hundred milliards of powder, three millions of cartridges, and forty thousand muskets, which were found in the different magazines. The number of artillery was estimated about seven hundred men. The garrison of Hameln was composed of three battalions of infantry, a squadron of cavalry, a regiment of veterans of one thousand men, four officers of artillery, and an officer of miners.

General Leopold Brotheir, chief of the staff-major, transmitted an account of the forced marches of the army, the least day's journey of which amounted to ten leagues. These rapid marches were performed through a marshy country affording no resource. The soldiers supported their fatigues and most painful privations with a confidence and courage of which they constantly received the example of the general in chief. The soldiers were recompensed for their ten days of fatigue and privation, by their present situation, and particularly by the satisfaction of having fulfilled, with so much celerity, the intentions of the government.

On the evening of the 4th of June, a French general entered the city of Bremen. He immediately waited on the chief burgomaster, and desired "that all English property, under whatever denomination it might be, should be taken possession of; and that all English sailors in the place, as well as other persons belonging to the English service, should be put under arrest." As soon as this demand was made, the officer who had come with it, went away to general Mortier. The answer given to this request was, that the senate "begged to decline the execution of a measure so inconsistent with their interests." Upon this the French commander threatened in person to carry his wishes into effect; and three ships belonging to the city were seized for the use of general Mortier and his army. The city of Osnaburgh, and indeed every place where property was supposed to be treasured, soon became a prey to the French forces. After these transactions Bonaparte made proposals to the English government for the restitution of Hanover on certain terms; but when the proposal was submitted to his majesty in council, the proposals were rejected. Disappointed in his views, and thwarted in his projects, the first consul ordered all the English in Hanover, in Piedmont, and in all the powers which were under his controul, to be arrested; he issued orders that no merchandize should be admitted into the electorate without a certificate from the commercial agent of the French republic at Hamburg, attesting that they were neither British productions nor manufactures, nor had paid British duties. This was a severe blow upon the English merchants, whose consignments to the different parts of Germany, to Switzerland, &c. were sent by Luneburg, and other cities of Hanover.

The shutting up the mouths of the Elbe and the Weser, was the next step pursued by the French government; thus all mercantile concerns were stagnated, industry was impeded, and thousands of individuals reduced to distress and beggary. The mercantile communications were now converted to the North, by the way of Gottenburgh (c).

The adulation poured in from all quarters of the French republic, whilst it buoyed up the vanity of the first consul, served to dignify the warlike preparations carried on in every part of the French nation. The military, the members of the senate, the tribunate, the legislative body, &c. severally addressed the first consul, entreating permission to accompany him in his projected expedition against England. The principal cities and towns voted men of war and frigates for this important service, and preparations for this desperate enterprize pervaded all classes of society in France (d).

The journals of Paris, in the pay of government, now thought it necessary to pour forth invective against the burg; after which it proceeds north-west, by the fortress of Gluckstadt, and falls into the German Ocean not far from that place. It is observable, that this river is navigable for large ships higher than any river in Europe, vessels of three or four hundred tons burthen sailing up as far as Hamburg, which is seventy miles from the sea.

The Weser, which rises in the mountains of Thuringia, runs north between Westphalia and Lower Saxony, and passing by Munden and Bremen, falls into the German Ocean below Carlstadt.

(b) In the court Gazette, published at Paris on the 15th of June, 1803, speaking of the king of England, and the complaints he made relative to the French attacking the electorate of Hanover, is the following passage: "These complaints broadly betray the spirit of ambition and ill-faith, which characterises and directs the cabinet of that monarch. What? In his capacity of king of England, he finds that France endangers the liberty of Europe by her usurpations: he flies to arms to espouse the quarrel of the kings of the continent; and in his capacity of elector of Hanover, where he is more nearly interested, he discovers no cause of complaint in the conduct of France. He looks upon France as a good ally? he is not disinclined to be at peace with her! This proves that the king of England acknowledges no other right than that of force, and that the elector of Hanover is silent only from the consciousness of weakness. Such is the golden rule, of just and unjust, which his majesty adopts. But, doubtless, if he could rekindle the flames of war upon the continent, if Hanover could furnish an army of two hundred thousand men, king  would not thus plead his neutrality!"

(c) Gottenburgh is situated on the German ocean, in the province of Bohus, and is the second city in Sweden, both on account of its trade and population; with a fair wind, ships may sail from Sunderland to Gottenburgh in forty-eight hours; the entrance to its harbour is more easy than to that of Cuxhaven; and in the coldest winters, the navigation is seldom interrupted for a long time, the tide being so very strong as to break and carry away the ice.—From Gottenburgh to Copenhagen or to Stockholm, a courier may easily travel in seventy-two hours, and from Gottenburgh to St. Petersburgh in six or eight days.

From Yarmouth to Cuxhaven, the passage is as long, if not longer than from Sunderland to Gottenburgh, considering the winds during certain seasons; from Cuxhaven to the Russian frontiers, are the worst roads in Europe, the expence of travelling very great, and the people dull, rude, and inhospitable. It requires at least ten or twelve days to travel from Cuxhaven to St. Petersburgh, five days to Copenhagen, and nine days to Stockholm.

(d) Chaptal, the minister of the interior, addressed a circular letter to the prefects, concerning the construction of the vessels to be employed in the invasion, of which the following is a copy:—

"Paris, June 24.

"In the position in which France is at present, and with the kind of enemies whom we have to combat, the bravery of the French would remain fruitless on the shores of the ocean, if the means of reaching their enemy were not furnished to them by numerous vessels. It is to the construction of vessels, therefore, that all your efforts ought to be directed: commerce, agriculture, and industry will suffer the less, the more speedy the execution. A flat bottomed boat of the first kind will cost thirty thousand franks (one thousand two hundred and fifty pounds sterling); one of the second, from eighteen thousand to twenty thousand; and one of the third from four thousand to six thousand.

"Two feet of water are sufficient to carry a flat bottomed boat not armed: there are few towns, therefore, that cannot execute an enterprize of this nature. These boats will be distinguished by the names of the towns, and the departments which have constructed them. The government will accept with satisfaction from a ship of the line down to the smallest transport. If each department, and each large town, by a general and rapid movement, put vessels on the stocks, the French army will soon go and dictate laws to the British government, and establish the repose of Europe, the liberty and prosperity of commerce, on the only bases by which their duration can be ensured."

British

British ministry, respecting the declaration of war against the Batavian republic:

"If," say they, "his Britannic majesty had acted with regard to the Batavian republic, as he had acted with regard to Spain; if, without his having seized on any of the ships, either of war or of commerce, belonging to the Dutch, Holland had, in consequence of the treaties which bind her to France, declared war against England, England might justly say that the calamities of war brought down upon Holland were the consequences of her connection with France.

"But his Britannic majesty has engaged in a war with Holland, by acts of hostility, on the same day that he commenced hostilities against us; and at the very moment when the message of the king of England contained a declaration of war against Holland, eighty Dutch ships were already in the British ports, in which they had been carried, not by privateers, but by brigs, frigates, and cruizers, belonging to the royal navy!

"And they will venture to appeal to the opinion of Europe, while they do not hesitate to commit every act calculated to excite the just indignation of all Europe! Their public law is enough to shame Tunis and Algiers; but it is worthy of them!"

Mr. Liston, the British ambassador, soon after took his departure from the Hague; but previously, he made overtures to the Batavian government, on the part of his court, by which Great Britain undertook to acknowledge the neutrality of Holland, upon condition, that the republic should refuse to join France in the war, or assist that power with troops. He was authorized to promise, besides, that the Batavian vessels, which had been taken as prizes, and were then in British ports, should be restored. Another demand was added, that the English agent of the post-office, arrested at Helvoetsluys, who was charged with sending information to the British commanders, should be released.

The intemperance which the first consul entertained towards the English, now broke forth in the most undisguised manner. He fulminated the most violent and rigorous injunctions against the introduction or continuance of the English commerce in his dominions, by enacting the following decree:

Paris, June 20.

The government of the republic, in consequence of the report of the minister of the interior, decrees as follows:

"1. From the date of the publication of this arrêt, there shall not be received into the ports of the republic, any colonial produce from the English colonies; nor any merchandize that comes directly or indirectly from England. Consequently, every kind of merchandize, or produce of English manufacture, or from the English colonies, will be confiscated.

"2. Neutral vessels, bound for the ports of the republic, must be furnished with a certificate, from the commissary or agent for the commercial concerns of the republic at the port from whence they sailed; which certificate shall contain the name of the vessel, and that of the captain; the nature of the cargo, the number of the crew, and destination of the voyage.—In this declaration, the commissary shall certify, that the vessel was laden under his own immediate inspection; and that the merchandize is not of English manufacture, and does not proceed from England or its colonies.—A counter-part of this declaration shall be addressed to the minister of the interior, by the commissary of the republic, on the very day of the vessel's departure.

"3. All captains, who from a negligence of the necessary forms, or a change in the place of their destination, shall not be furnished with similar declarations, will be refused admittance into the ports of the republic, but on condition that they shall reload their vessels with the produce of the French manufactories, to an amount equal to the value of his cargo. The director of the customs shall send to the prefect of the department, an account of the cargo, and the goods taken in return; and having examined it, the prefect will deliver the permit to leave the port.

"4. The ministers of the interior, and of the finances, are charged with the execution of the present arrêt, which will be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

"The first consul, (Signed) BONAPARTE."

The threat of invasion, also, against Great Britain, assumed shape and consistency. An army of reserve was formed at Deventer, under the command of general Desolles; this, with the number of troops already assembled between that place and Flushing, was estimated at nearly eighty thousand men. To this force, by way of pre-eminence, was given the pompous title of "The Army of England!" A camp of ninety thousand men was formed at Dunkirk, and another of sixty thousand men was raised at Calais, at which place the first consul had arrived on his military tour into Belgium; having previously ordered that all the English should be removed.

The army was increased in all quarters. A number of fresh corps were marched to several parts of Holland. The Hague was furnished with a French brigade, in place of a Dutch regiment that had been removed, and general Victor, was declared by the Dutch government, commander-in-chief of the Batavian army. It appears, however, that the great object of Bonaparte was not so much the invasion of England, though that was held to be the ostensible design, as the means of keeping his troops employed. The south of Germany held out no temptation for war, as that unfortunate part of the continent had been already exhausted, during ten years' hostility; but those princes in the north of Germany, as well as the Hanse Towns, were in possession of considerable treasure, mostly in specie: these were, the king of Prussia, the electors of Hanover and Saxony. The first, with two hundred thousand men at his command, could not be immediately attacked, therefore a good understanding was kept up with him. A pretext was soon found for a war on the second; and contributions, exactions, forced loans, were found indispensible by the first consul, as they enabled him not only to support a numerous army, without encumbering the people more immediately around him; but occasioned at the same time a vast circulation of foreign specie in the French territory.

Conscriptions now took place throughout the republican territory; the utmost severities were exercised in raising these conscripts. This revolutionary oppression was invented by Robespierre, improved by the directory, and organized by Bonaparte.

The aspect of Europe at this time was rather singular; all was trepidation or apathy; the Germanic body was a chimera, formed of jarring interests; Russia, and the powers of the north, seemed to fear the menaces of the first consul; whilst Naples, Portugal, and Spain, alike dreaded his friendship or his hatred: the latter, aware that if a rupture took place between England and France, she must be inevitably drawn into a war, began to prepare for the worst. Naturally allied to the French, she considered their interests as congenial as their territories were contiguous; and a perpetual treaty of alliance against the common enemy could alone preserve her rich possessions from the attacks of the first consul. In short, she considered that if she did not support France in the contest, she could expect no assistance when her turn should come to sustain the attacks of England. The strict union of two powers, who possessed such an extent of coast in the ocean and the Mediterranean, and who ought always to join in a common cause, would oblige the English to spread their maritime forces over a variety of points, by which division they would be so weakened as to be incapable of offensive operations, particularly as the considerable armies that must be kept to protect their own metropolis from the threatened attack of an enthusiastic enemy, would prevent them from attempting distant expeditions. It, however, appeared that England would not leave to Spain the choice of peace or war, as, from the extent of her navy, she was possessed with the opinion, that she was capable of attacking the whole world, and that Spain was the first upon the list of her enemies. But the extreme anxiety of France to effect a reconciliation, by every plausible method, had been of infinite service, as it had enabled the Spanish ships from the colonies to arrive with an immense quantity of specie, and afforded the means of defraying the expences of a long continued war.

The naval register of this period furnished several instances of the prowess with which British sailors might be said to challenge the courage of their enemies.

Captain Pearson of the Doris, whilst cruizing off Ushant, fell in with the French republican lugger L'Affronteur, commanded by Monsieur Morice André Dutoya, lieutenant de vaisseau, mounting fourteen guns and ninety-two men. In her endeavour to escape the British ship, the shot from the Doris killed her commander and eight men, when she surrendered to captain Pearson, who had only one man wounded on board his ship.

The Minotaur, another of his majesty's ships, fell in with the French republican frigate La Française, off the Dodman, which she chased, in company with the Albion, and took. The French vessel was pierced for twenty-eight twelve-pounders on her main-deck, and sixteen nine-pounders on the quarter-deck and fore-castle, ten of which were in her hold; she had on board also one hundred and eighty-seven men.

Captain Wallis, of his majesty's ship the Naiad, also captured the French national corvette L'Impatient, of twenty guns and eighty men. This was a very fine vessel, and esteemed one of the swiftest French sailers. Captain Wallis was successful likewise in capturing the French merchant-ship La Chasseur, laden with sugar, cotton, coffee, &c. from St. Domingo to L'Orient, a very handsome vessel, of three hundred and fifty-nine tons burthen, and newly coppered.

The various prizes taken by lieutenant Senhouse deserve notice here: this gentleman, in the Hind revenue cutter, captured La Felicité, a French cutter privateer, Le Charles, a merchant brig, laden with oak timber for constructing ships from Rouen to Rochefort; a Dutch galliot, laden with salt for Rotterdam, from the coast of Portugal; a Dutch Indiaman, with a very valuable cargo of cotton and coffee, from Surinam.

But the most prominent of the successes by British valour, during the month of June, were the captures of St. Lucia and Tobago, two of the West India islands. In consequence of the success of his majesty's arms, lieutenant general Grinfield, commander-in-chief of his majesty's troops in the Windward and Leeward Caribbee islands forwarded the following dispatch to lord Hobart:

"My lord, St. Lucia, June 22, 1803.

"It is with satisfaction I have the honour to acquaint your lordship, that this day the fortress of Morne Fortunée was carried by assault, and the island of St. Lucia is in consequence unconditionally restored to the British government.

"I have to state to your lordship, that in consequence of his majesty's order, signified to me in your letter, dated the 16th of May, and received on the 14th instant, which I immediately communicated to commodore Hood, he arrived at Barbadoes on the 17th; the troops, stores, &c. were on board, or embarked on the 19th; sailed on the 20th. On the 21st, at day-break, they were off the north end of St. Lucia; in the course of the day the greatest part of the troops were disembarked in Choque Bay; about half past five the out-posts of the enemy were driven in, the town of Castries teken, and a summons was sent to the commander of the troops of the French republic.

"In consequence of the refusal of brigade general Nogues to accede to any terms, and the expectation of approaching rains, it became necessary to get possession of the Morne with as little delay as possible. It was therefore determined, this morning, to attack the fortress by assault, which was done accordingly at four o'clock, and it was carried in about half an hour, and with less loss, considering the resistance, than could have been expected; but the loss has been chiefly among the higher ranks of officers, and those most truly valuable: but it is yet to be hoped most of them will recover, for the real benefit of his majesty's service.

"I cannot omit a circumstance which reflects so much credit, as well on the British nation, as on the conduct of the soldiers actually employed, that, notwithstanding the severe and spirited resistance of the French troops, yet, no sooner were the works carried by assault, and the opposition no longer existed, than every idea of animosity appeared to cease, and not a French soldier was either killed or wounded.

"The return of the killed and wounded, excepting the number of officers of high rank, is not equal to what might have been expected, and, by far less than it would have been, in all probability, had a formal investment of the fortress taken place (e)."

The dispatch of commodore Hood to sir Evan Nepean, was also expressive of the alacrity which the naval part of the expedition testified in co-operation with the military.

"On my arrival at Barbadoes (writes the commodore) on the 17th, late in the evening, having consulted lieutenant-general Grinfield with respect to the intended co-operations of the army and navy, I instantly took measures to prevent farther supplies being thrown into St. Lucia, (the ships on this service, under the orders of captain O'Bryen, of the Emerald, made some captures of trading vessels) and every disposition was settled for embarking the troops and light artillery on board the ships of war, and the necessary stores, &c. in small vessels for the expedition; by great exertions, the whole was effected on the 20th, and the arrangements completed: the lieutenant-general having embarked with the troops, I put to sea with the ships Centaur, Courageux, Argo, Chichester, Hornet, and Cyane, and was joined the next morning by the Emerald and Osprey, having brigadier-general Prevost on board, and were all anchored by eleven o'clock in the bay.

"There being a strong breeze, the boats of the squadron had a heavy pull, with the first division of the army, composed of the second battalion of the Royals, and two field-pieces, under the command of brigadier-general Brereton; but, by the great energy and excellent disposition made by captain Hallowell, were landed in good order about two p. m. and by the perseverance of every officer and man employed in landing the remainder of the troops, the lieutenant-general was enabled to make an early arrangement for an attack on that very important and strong post, Morne Fortunée, where the force of the enemy was assembled, which, on the commandant refusing to give up when summoned, was ordered to be attacked with that decision and promptitude which has always been the characteristic mark of lieutenant-general Grinfield, and carried by storm at half past four this morning, with the superior bravery which has ever distinguished the British soldier: this placed the colony completely in our possession (f)."

The success attendant upon the capture of St. Lucia, induced general Grinfield and commodore Hood to pursue their good fortune, and attempt the reduction of Tobago.

"The circumstances which led to this fortunate and valuable conquest," says general Grinfield, were as follow:

"On the 25th of June, commodore Hood, with the fleet and troops, sailed from St. Lucia, and on the 30th, at day-break, made the island of Tobago. About five o'clock in the afternoon, having landed the greater part of the troops, the two leading columns marched forward to Scarborough, and meeting no opposition in the defiles of St. Mary's advanced to Mount Grace, from which place I sent a summons to the commandant general Berthier, who returned an answer, by producing terms of capitulation, which were finally settled about four this morning, and at eleven, possession of the fortress was given the British forces; the French garrison marching out with the honours of war, and laying down their arms, after passing the guard of honour, under the orders of brigadier-general Picton.

"The fort having surrendered without resistance, I can only speak, in general terms of the excellent discipline and good conduct of the officers and soldiers in this expedition; there is no doubt, had the French garrison been

(e) The total of the killed and wounded on this occasion was—four serjeants, sixteen rank and file, killed; four field officers, two captains, three subalterns, four serjeants, ninety-seven rank and file, wounded; one drummer, seven rank and file, missing.

St. Lucia, 22*d June*, 1803.

(f) Return of ordnance, ammunition, and stores, at Morne Fortunée, and the batteries adjoint.

Iron guns—seven thirty-six pounders, four twenty-four pounders, one twenty-two pounder, thirteen eighteen pounders, seven twelve pounders, six eight pounders, two four pounders. Brass guns—two four pounders. Iron mortar—one thirteen inch. Brass mortars—one ten inch, two eight inch. Round shot—one thousand four hundred thirty-six pounders, seven hundred and thirteen twenty-four pounders, five hundred and seventy-seven eighteen pounders, one hundred and four twelve pounders, thirty-one eight pounders, sixty-eight four pounders. Case shot—twenty six pounders.—Round shot fixed to powder—thirty-two six pounders. Ten case shot fixed to powder. Shells empty—two hundred and sixty-eight thirteen inch, eighty-five ten inch, one hundred and twenty-six eight inch. Flannel cartridges, filled—eighteen thirty-six pounders, thirty-eight twenty-four pounders, thirteen eighteen pounders, forty-five twelve pounders, six six pounders. Paper cartridges filled—twenty-one twenty-four pounders.—Sixty empty paper carriages.—Two thousand musket balls—seventy-two portfires—ten eight inch shells bursters—one gyn—twelve powder horns—sixty pounds of slow match—forty-six handspikes.—Spunges without staves and rammers—four thirty-six pounders, three twenty-four pounders. Ladles without ditto—one thirty-six pounder, three twenty-four pounders, one six pounder. Rammers without ditto—two thirty-six pounders, four twenty-four pounders. Wadhooks without ditto—one thirty-six pounder, two twenty-four pounders—five hundred weight of musket balls—eighteen and quarter pounds of rockets: Fuzes—four hundred ten inch—five hundred and fifty eight inch—one hundred and fifty-five and half inch—eighty-six barrels of powder—one leather cartouch—five hundred and thirteen muskets—four hundred bayonets—four hundred and sixty pouches—four hundred belts.

Return of engineers' stores taken at Morne Fortunée, the 22d June, 1803.

One thousand five hundred sand bags—seven hammers—one anvil—two vices—two pair bellows—five pair tongs—twenty-five spades—one cross cut saw—twenty-five pair hinges—fourteen barrel, nails—six pickaxes—one iron crow—eight axes—three rammers—one stone cutter's saw—sixty barrels lime—five tons iron—one hundred weight steel—twenty wheel barrows.

suf-

sufficiently strong to have hazarded resistance, they would have met as obstinate an attack, as was experienced by the garrison at Morne Fortunée.

"It is next to impossible for me to say too much in praise of the co-operation of the navy. The troops are in the highest degree indebted to commodore Hood, for the accommodation afforded to them on board, and to the judicious arrangements and execution in the embarking and disembarkation of them by captain Hallowell.

"I take the liberty to enclose a copy of the orders given to the troops.

"I likewise enclose a list of the troops of the French republic who laid down their arms in consequence of the capitulation; also the return of ordnance and military stores taken in the fort and other batteries in this island."

General Grinfield, upon making good his landing, issued the following summons to general Berthier, commandant of Tobago:

"The forces of his Britannic majesty, now landed in this island, being so superior to those of the French republic, that resistance will only prove an unnecessary profusion of the lives of men:

"The superiority of the British naval force over that of the French in those seas, must preclude the hope of succour:

"The commanders of the British army and navy being fully sensible of the decided superiority, so fully evinced on the 22d instant, by the capture of Morne Fortunée, in the island of St. Lucia, by assault, offer to the French commanding officer to accede to any reasonable proposals for the immediate surrender of this island, as he may think proper to offer, premising only, that the garrison must surrender prisoners of war, to be conveyed to Europe, and that all the public property is to be at the disposal of the captors.

"The officer who will have the honour to deliver this, is to wait one hour, and no longer, for an answer."

This proposal having been delivered, the French general Cæsar Berthier, captain-general of the island of Tobago, in the name of the French republic, offered terms of capitulation, which was in general agreed to (g).

The month of June closed with the publication of lord Hobart's plan to the lords lieutenants of the maritime counties, for the protection of the coast: by this it was recommended, that

"1st. The lords lieutenants of the maritime counties should co-operate with the board of admiralty in obtaining the enrollment of all sea-faring men, not applicable to the service of the navy, upon their respective coasts, under the denomination of 'SEA FENCIBLES.'

"II. It was recommended to the principal sea-port towns, to equip, at their own expence, a certain number of armed vessels and hulks, to be stationed for the better security and protection of such ports, and to be appropriated to and manned by Sea Fencibles, who should take charge of them, and be exercised on board at the guns, as often as might be required.

"III. That when the proportion of sea fencibles, which any place could furnish, might be greater than such place could find shipping to employ; and likewise when any place was capable of providing men, but unable to procure vessels; in both such cases vessels should be supplied by government.

"IV. That as colliers and coasting vessels were well adapted to be armed as gun-boats, it was recommended to the principal merchants and owners in every part of the kingdom, to fit their vessels of that description with slides (h) between decks, and loop-holes in the combings of their hatchways, for close quarters; these vessels to carry two guns forward and two aft, to fight on either side, as well as fore and aft.

"V. That when the vessels were reported ready, guns and ammunition should be put on board by government, free of expence to the owners; the masters giving a receipt and voucher to return them when demanded, and to keep a regular account of the expenditure of the stores.

"VI. That these vessels should be fitted with ring and eye-bolts for guns, and that small vessels be prepared to receive large oars, that they might be able to act in a calm, if necessary.

"VII. That the vessels should be under orders to attend to and obey the signals and directions that might be made to them by the commanders of his majesty's ships, or from the signal stations on the shore, and when detained, that they were to be entitled to demurrage according to their regular tonnage, at the same rate as common transports; the time of detention to be certified by the officer who might order it.

"VIII. That the said vessels, on arriving at and sailing from port, should be subject to visitation by the commanding officer of the Sea Fencibles of the district."

The recommendations of lord Hobart were soon followed by several patriotic suggestions: each one thought himself bound to give his assistance and best information in his power towards repelling the threatened attacks of the enemy; and although the volunteer associations, which were embodied about this time, gained universal and just applause; yet it was necessary that something should be promoted which might prevent the more immediate and sudden pressure of rapacious adventurers, upon men who were unused to the fatigues and hazards of military life; however the love of their country and its constitution might have placed them above every other consideration. Ingenuity and experience, therefore, furnished various propositions for putting the kingdom into every possible state of security.

The offers made by the cities and towns of France to build vessels of various sizes for the service of their government, were, however, far exceeded by the marks of patriotism which distinguished the subjects of the British isles. Among others, a plan for the inhabitants of manufacturing towns to open subscriptions for building gun-boats for their respective harbours, merited approbation.

By this plan it was proved, that the expence of an excellent boat would be but small to an opulent sea-port; it might be manned with the fishermen and boatmen of the place. The services of such gun-boats might be under regulations, similar to those which govern the volunteer associations; so that they might be under the obligation to extend their service from their own line of coast to any part, where the probable attempts of the enemy should make their exertions necessary.

The adoption of this plan, it was stated, would soon be productive of a considerable flotilla of gun-boats, manned by effective and daring seamen, who, habituated to the element on which they were to serve, would, by their natural resolution and activity, strike terror into the seamen of France; and by the superior management of their vessels, not only do considerable damage, but entirely defeat a superior force. Another benefit was to be derived from this plan, gun-boats having an advantage over land batteries, so that by their removal, as occasion should require, they might protect or annoy; a few such vessels, carrying heavy guns, would make prodigious havock among those flat-bottomed boats, usually appropriated to the debarkation of soldiery.

After having been proved, that in many parts of England there are a number of aquatic labourers, who could serve in such vessels with peculiar advantage; it might with great certainty be added, that even the keelmen of the Tyne and the Wear would find such an employment in the service of their country, more congenial to their peculiar disposition, and more satisfactory to the spirit which they would naturally evince in its protection; their amount being at least to the amount of fifty thousand able-bodied men, would do more essential duty than by being drilled as soldiers. To these might be joined the large body of fishermen, lightermen, and boatmen, from the various parts of the kingdom, which would furnish a vast assemblage of hardy-bodied men, whose services could not be any where so effectually exerted as on their own element. These, and similar recommendations, employed the talents of the generality of British subjects, who strove to evince their willingness to benefit their country at such a crisis, by every means in their power.

In the debate which took place on the army estimates, June 6, the secretary at war produced papers relative to some additional sums for the support of supernumerary officers, pensioners at Chelsea and Kilmainham; the erection of the royal military college and the military asylum, (g) Among the ordnance captured at Tobago were—thirty-one thousand one hundred and ten cartridges—six hundred and ninety cylinders—two brass guns mounted—nineteen iron guns, dismounted—three brass mortars—three hundred and fifty-six shells—six hundred and sixty-five case shot—one hundred and four grape shot—six thousand seven hundred and forty-four round shot—three hundred and twenty-six muskets—six hundred and nineteen spikes—four hundred and forty fuzees—and a great variety of lesser articles.

(h) The expence of such a fitting was calculated at fifty four pounds per vessel.

for

for which, and other necessaries for the military establishment, he moved, that three millions one hundred and ten thousand pounds might be raised, for the service of Great Britain and Ireland.

Upon this Mr. Windham took occasion to repeat his objections to the system pursued by the ministry, particularly with regard to the militia. He contended, that as the country was not sufficiently populous to supply both those descriptions of force, that the regular army should have the preference. Ministers did not appear to him to have duly considered the nature and character of the war in which the country was engaged, nor to have yet made up their minds as to the plan of operations they ought to pursue. Either they had not determined on any plan at all, or that which they adopted was exceedingly fallacious. They were evidently forced into war, and their resolution was scarcely formed when they got into it; therefore they had not yet prepared their measures.—If defence alone even was intended, he did not think the sort of force proposed to be raised, that which sound wisdom would recommend; for, if invasion should take place, the militia was not the most desirable force to employ; a regular army ought to be met by a regular army. He expressed his decided conviction that, unless some very strong measures were immediately taken, nothing effectual could be done. Provisions should be made to raise the people en masse, if necessary; for the period might suddenly come, when, without exertion, our fate would be precarious indeed.—It was come to this with Great Britain, that either she must strengthen herself, materially indeed, or weaken the enemy considerably, or she could not subsist. He urged the adoption of a liberal and dignified plan of policy, which should make a common cause, not only with the royalists of La Vendée, or any other part of France, but with the patriots of Holland, Switzerland, and Italy. When gentlemen talked, he said, of the people of the country stopping an invading army, he confessed that, though he admired the spirit, and confided in the loyalty of his country as much as any man, he could not help smiling; for where, he would ask, was the precedent of a populace, without discipline or arrangement, opposing with success the progress of a regular army? He therefore deprecated the dastardly and imprudent policy of keeping our forces locked up in our own island, waiting, as it were, until the French should come over to attack us.

The Secretary at War thought that the question between the two governments was now brought to a point, that it was high time we should shew, not by words, but actions, that we were not to be insulted by France; that we were not to be intimidated by any menace they might throw out; that it is not their shewing themselves in large numbers opposite to our coasts, which was to throw us into a panic. That they might throw a body of men into this country was certainly practicable. It might be done certainly under favourable circumstances, that is, if they were not drowned in the attempt: but really, said the right honourable secretary, it would not be long before they would be made prisoners; and that very few of them would ever return.

Mr. Pitt said, it did not appear that it would have been fortunate if ministers had rather begun by establishing in the opinion of parliament and of the country, the necessity of the thing to be done, by preparing the public mind by an adequate vote for that purpose. He would assert, that as we wanted the means of offensive, we should have the more of defensive war. He applauded every desire which ministers could manifest to labour with perseverance to consider of the best means for the safety of the state. If, therefore, gentlemen concurred with him, as indeed he believed the house did, that the present force was insufficient, he wished them then to pledge themselves; to pledge parliament; to pledge the nation too; that a strong measure should be taken for the defence of the nation, without any loss of time. His object by all he had said was, that the country should be told at once, that it was to prepare for measures of an unusual extent; that the people should be impressed with a notion that extraordinary preparations must be made, that extraordinary means must be used. He thought that a large portion of regular troops might be added to the seventy thousand militia, and must be kept at home, or we should not have a sufficient force for home security.

He then proceeded to make several observations on the numbers of the militia, &c. and then said, he hoped that the additional force to be raised was not to depend upon a system of tardy and precarious recruiting, and that the forces should not be confined to serve at home, as a force necessary merely for home defence, and that at all events we should secure the advantages of the forces being under officers regularly trained. They knew that they had raised by ballot, without interfering with the agriculture or the industry of the country, one hundred thousand men. He knew, from the concurring opinion of almost all militia officers, that they could not hope to have, on the militia plan, officers for more than seventy thousand men. The country must be put in a proper state of military preparation; and whatever is wanted for the public defence, some how or other must be obtained.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the ministry did not rely, in the present crisis, upon the militia consisting of seventy thousand men, great part of whom were at present in arms; that they did not rely upon the regular force of the country, which was at present greater than at any other period, except when an embarkation was about to take place; that they did not rely upon the brave and loyal yeomanry of the conntry; but that they were prepared to bring forward measures for the purpose of providing a large subsidiary force, to be officered in the manner pointed out by his right honourable friend. In looking to the population of the country, and the means of constituting a large and effective force, he said, it was not merely an option on the part of government, whether such a force should be called out; but they must consider how, consistently with the feelings and opinions of the country, and the avocations of men of business, the largest and most effective force could be provided for defensive and offensive operations; it appeared to him, that those means ought to be resorted to which were calculated to provide such a force with the greatest public advantage, and the least possible inconvenience. The right honourable gentleman had adverted to the danger arising from an invading enemy; that right honourable gentleman would do him (Mr. Addington) the justice to recollect that he never under-rated that danger, though he thought at the same time that it had been greatly over-rated: it was their duty, however, to provide against such a danger, and that without delay.

After several desultory observations had been made, the motion for the supplies was agreed to.

In the house of lords, on June 7, the second reading of the Clergy Farming and Residence Bill took place.—The Lord Chancellor having left the woolsack, observed the necessity of amending the act of Henry VIII. concerning the regulation of the clergy, which went to enforce regulations upon each of the two distinct heads, to which different parts of the bill referred. The enactments of the act of Henry VIII. were in both points ill adapted to the present times; and in regard to the penalties to enforce residence, perfectly inadequate, and consequently unjust. A bill having such important interests as the ease, accommodation, and comfort of the clergy for its objects, interests involving the preservation, discipline, and security of the church establishment, was a bill fit at least to go to a committee, in order to see if such parts of it as might possibly be liable to objection, could be so amended as to render the whole of the bill fit to become a part of the law of the land.

The Earl of Suffolk said, he was desirous that the income of the clergy should be such as would enable them to live decently and comfortably. He understood that the livings of one half of the inferior clergy, at least, did not produce seventy pounds a year, and many nothing like it. He had one particular proof of the poverty of some of the clergy, who held livings which he would state. Many years since he visited the Lakes, and at a particular place, he was told, there was a slate mine well worth his seeing. He asked if he could have any accommodation there? He was told he might at the clergyman's. He replied, he could not obtrude himself on a gentleman, to whom he was a stranger. "Oh," said the person, with whom he conversed, "you need not mind that, the clergyman keeps a public house!" He then asked what his living produced, and the answer was "fourteen pounds a year, but he makes out a maintenance by playing upon the fiddle, and can play a country-dance, a jig, and a hornpipe admirably." Upon his hearing this, his lordship said, he gave up going, as he did not wish to see a clergyman in so indecorous and unbecoming a situation. There were, he next observed, many prebendaries, the income of which had risen to two, three, or four hundred a year; they he thought ought to give give a first fruit and a tenth, in addition to Queen Anne's bounty, which had done a great deal of good, but only averaging about fifteen thousand pounds a year, was not equal to what was necessary to support the inferior clergy as they ought to be. He desired their lordships to call to mind that the clergy of France having joined the tiers etats, was one great leading cause of the revolution. They ought to be enabled to hold their station as an independent and respectable body.

The Duke of Richmond objected to the principle of the bill: it went to take away from the juries the right of trying the causes brought against such of the clergy as were sued for non-residence, and to lodge that power in the hands of the bishops, for whom he entertained a very high respect; but he could not but consider that the laity, whether affluent, or only moderately able to keep house, paid the clergy of every description for the religious duties they performed, and therefore he could not but be of opinion, that the jurisdiction to enforce the residence of their rector or vicar should remain in their hands, and ought not to be transferred to the right reverend prelates.

The Lord Chancellor read a clause from the act of Henry VIII. to shew the violent injustice that might be practised under it; and he remarked, that in trying a cause upon a penal statute, no discretion was vested either in a judge or jury. The judge must be bound by the express letter of the law, and must in his direction lay down the rule of law for them to go by, without referring to, or observing upon, the hardship of the case, be it ever so great. He mentioned two causes which had been tried by himself in one week, that of the exemplary clergyman of Bow-church, for non-residence, although the parsonage house was the little pocket book shop, the corner of the church-yard, a residence not fit to put a clergyman into, and therefore he was obliged to reside in Ely place: and the other cause that of a clergyman, who held two or more livings in the city, but had lived for nine years, sporting and taking his pleasure in Somersetshire. Both were obliged to be fined the penalty of one hundred and ten pounds, though their cases were so dissimilar. He also mentioned a cause of non-residence, tried before a noble and learned lord now dead, who had been provoked to declare in court, that it was the most impudent cause he had ever tried. The cause was this.—A cunning attorney in a country town lived in a house rather too small for his family, and observing that the parsonage house was much larger, and the incumbent a single man, proposed an exchange upon his paying rent. When he demanded his rent, the attorney said, "Don't trouble me about rent, or I shall prosecute you for non-residence; and then there will be a considerable balance in my favour." He did prosecute the minister, and obtained the penalty.

The bishop of Norwich approved the bill in its principle, but he did not think it altogether faultless. Having gone through the law as it stood, he addressed his argument to the bill he held in his hand, and went through a summary statement of the objects of each clause. The first part of the bill, he observed, referred solely to what was termed the farming facilities given to the clergy, and the latter to the residence. With respect to empowering the bishops to exercise an undefined and unlimited authority, they could not desire it, but if he himself were asked, in what hands could that controul be most constitutionally placed? he would answer conscientiously, in none that he knew of so fitly as those proposed by this bill; certainly under due restrictions, and with all that aweful responsibility which did, as it always ought, attach to every public department, under the constitutional laws of this country.

This important bill was committed for Friday the 10th (i), and, by several adjournments, postponed, till it finally passed on the 24th of June.

On the 11th, Mr. Addington produced his budget; and in recapitulating the ways and means for providing for the exigencies of the current year, he observed the sum of twenty-six millions would be adequate to every exertion, and amply sufficient for every national object; the only part of this budget which appeared disagreeable was the tax upon property, of which we have already mentioned some objectional points. On the resumption of the subject, when the report was presented, several objections were made by the members to the various taxes.

Lord Folkstone reprobated the system of war taxes. Such taxes might, he said, be very proper and considerate, but the giving them such an appellation was, he thought, the very means of creating a reluctance in the people to pay them. When people are very anxious for war, it was, no doubt, fair, not to burden their posterity, with a continuance of such a mode of taxation: but as the inhabitants of this country seem rather willing to submit to insults, and bear with ministers, who were willing not to remonstrate, or when they did remonstrate, to acquiesce with the silence and total inattention with which their remon-

(i) On the 10th, after the question was put, "That the house resolve itself into a committee," the bishop of St. Asaph (Dr. Horsley) delivered his opinion upon the duties of the clergy, and the necessity of residence; which, for beauty of expression and strength of argument, has seldom been excelled; we therefore subjoin the substance of it in a note, as being the most pointed in the course of the debate. He observed, that the principle of the bill, as he understood it, embraced two points; first, to enforce the residence of the clergy; and secondly, to preserve them pure and separate in a proper state of ecclesiastical discipline, uncontaminated by sordid occupations and pursuits. Residence he considered of first rate importance, and essentially necessary to the welfare of the church. Without it, it was impossible for any clergyman to discharge the duty which he owed his flock. The public performance of that duty, such as attendance at church on Sunday, constituted but a very small part of it.

The parish priest should live among his flock, he should watch over them, and be an example constantly before their eyes of rectitude, enforcing the precepts of virtue, which it is his duty to inculcate. He should attend the bed of the sick and the dying, and administer to them those comforts which alone they are capable at such a moment of receiving, those comforts which are administered to them through the sacraments of the church. The mere enumeration of these duties was surely sufficient to shew that residence is essential to their performance. Residence, at the time of the reformation, was a mere matter of ecclesiastical discipline, and the civil power never interfered with it. It was objected to the present bill, that it takes the power of inforcing residence out of the hands of the civil authority, and places it under ecclesiastical jurisdiction. For his part, he was not anxious to take the question out of the hands of judges and juries. On the contrary, were a proposition made to repeal the act of Henry VIII. by which juries have that power, he would oppose it upon that very ground, unless it provided some regulation that might prove an adequate substitute in that particular point. The statute of Henry VIII. with all its vices on its head, had done more good than harm. He admitted, however, that it was certainly defective, inasmuch as it inflicted equal penalties upon unequal degrees of delinquency, and also upon unequal means, the forfeiture not being proportioned to the amount of the living. It was also defective in not leaving a discretionary power to judges to reduce the penalty, in cases where the letter of the law could not be inforced without peculiar rigour and hardship.

The present bill remedied that defect, as it had provided a scale of penalties proportioned to the means of the party, and the different degrees of delinquency. With regard to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the old act goes the length of depriving the contumacious clergyman of his benefices. From delay, expence, and a variety of other circumstances, it was impossible, however, to carry the act into execution, and therefore, it was no more than a dead letter. In some old dioceses, such as Winchester, the proceedings of the ecclesiastical court were correct, and justice was administered as well as in Westminster Hall. That, however, was not the case in the provincial courts. He remembered giving, when bishop of St. David's, a living of seven hundred pounds a year, the best in his diocese, to a clergyman who promised to reside; the clergyman had, however, a living in Glamorganshire, and did not change his place of residence; of this he complained, but at length consented to admit of six months residence, which the clergyman promised. Even this promise, however, was not kept, and he proceeded to enforce the act to compel residence, or deprive him of the benefice, but, by the connivance of his own court, the party slipped through his fingers, and remains to this very day in possession of the living, without having resided upon it. This case shews the insufficiency of the provincial courts in this particular. It became, therefore, necessary, that a power should be placed in the hands of the bishops; and as this was done by the present bill, that part of it also had his approbation. With regard to the other part of the act of Henry VIII. which restrains the clergy from having any thing to do with the low pursuits of the world, he should beg leave to make a few observations.

When he spoke of the clergy being nothing but clergy, he did not mean to be an advocate for that puritanical cant that would entirely cut them off from all commerce with the world. To advise his flock required a knowledge of the world. The duty of a clergyman could not be adequately performed by any, but a man of knowledge and information. To expound the Bible he should be acquainted with every science. The clergyman, therefore could not be considered as mispending his time, who was studying a mathematical proposition, or calculating the proportions of a piece of architecture. No, the clergyman should be restrained only from those things that degrade him. He should not be engaged in sordid pursuits. Agriculture, he admitted, was of old said to be the business of heroes and the gods. It did honour to Ceres and Triptolemus. It was a business worthy of men in the most exalted stations; but when a clergyman engaged in agriculture, he did not, like their lordships, engage in it for amusement, or from public spirit, but from sordid views. Now this was what he condemned. He could by no means allow of the profession of a farmer as compatible with the grave dignity of the clerical character: it must lead the farming clergyman to associate with the labourer in the field, to wield the sickle and scythe, to carry his samples to market, and to chaffer and drive bargains about his commodities, incompatible with his character, and degrading to his station. It was true, the statute of Henry VIII. prevented this abuse, but the provisions in that particular were extremely severe. He feared, however, that the relaxation was carried too far in the present bill.

strances were treated, he thought it was absolutely wrong to lead people into a disinclination towards that war, or to create selfish feelings to render it unpopular. This was the reason of his objecting to the principles of war taxes, as at present brought forward.

After much objection to the various articles of taxation in detail, Mr. William Smith observed, that he could not avoid mentioning his disapprobation of the principle of the income tax; the inquisitorial part of it particularly. He thought it the most oppressive and unjust that was ever suggested to a British house of commons; and if the right honourable gentleman had an opportunity of hearing the sentiments of the various classes of the people as he had done, he would also be convinced how severely it was reprobated by a vast majority of the people. He thought this tax might have been avoided, and a larger revenue raised by increasing the duty on malt; and he wished the chancellor of the exchequer had tried that experiment, as he was convinced it would have been found much more popular.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was very much his wish taxes should be raised with as much regard to the feelings of the people as possible. The honourable gentleman had said, that by making an addition to the duty on malt, the inquisition of the other tax might be avoided; but it would be a great injustice to the brewers to levy such a tax, without admitting them to the right of raising the price of beer. The rise could not well be less than a halfpenny a pot, or four shillings and six-pence a barrel, which would be productive of inordinate profit to the brewers; and if you did not allow them to raise the price, you would be guilty of great injustice. He had taken every possible care, he said, in modifying the tax, so as not to affect persons possessed of that description of property below seventy pounds a year. It had ever been his most ardent and anxious wish to carry public feeling and public opinion along with him: for while he was determined to look all our difficulties fairly in the face, he was convinced that, with the public feeling in its favour, the arm of government, or rather the arm of this great country, must prove irresistible.

The report was then brought up, and the resolutions read and agreed to.

The discussion of naval abuses occupied the attention of the house of commons on the 16th of this month. For the purpose of investigating circumstances of such vast national importance.

Mr. Whitbread moved for certain papers relative to the late visitation of the dock-yards. It appeared to him absolutely necessary, that all possible information should be immediately laid before the house on this subject; and he could see no objection which the noble lord at the head of the admiralty (earl St. Vincent) could possibly entertain, relative to what he was about to propose. In prosecuting the naval inquiry, that noble lord had thought proper to visit the different dock-yards in the kingdom, along with the commissioners. Since their report was made out and presented to the house, it had occasioned much conversation, and much obloquy had been incurred. These circumstances, when properly brought to light, ought most undoubtedly to have great weight, in shewing the beneficial consequences which must result from the noble lord's exertions for the public interest. It was certainly true, however, that some most gross delinquencies had been found out in the course of that investigation, and in his opinion it was most proper and expedient that the delinquents should be brought to punishment.

This was opposed by the chancellor of the exchequer, on the ground that as the investigation was already before a committee appointed by the house; the present motion would interfere with their jurisdiction.

After much conversation on the subject, Mr. Whitbread withdrew his motion. The minister, however, observed, that the delinquencies were so enormous, as to deserve exemplary punishment, which he should certainly think it his duty to promote at some future period.

On the same day also Mr. Corry moved, that the house resolve into a committee to take into consideration the acts of the 39th and 40th of the king, respecting the restriction of issuing small bank notes and bills of exchange in Ireland. His motive for going into this committee was to take into consideration the pernicious practice which had long prevailed in Ireland, of issuing bank notes for small sums under twenty shillings value, upon a pretence of scarcity of silver coin. So far from removing the evil which this practice professed to remedy, it was, in his mind, the true cause of it. It had originated in consequence of the bank restriction act, which stopped the issue of cash from the bank of Ireland; and its effect had been to absorb all the silver currency, in those parts of the country where these notes were taken, into the hands of the persons who passed them, which they disposed of in some mode that took it completely out of circulation. These notes were even issued by obscure persons, for three, six, and ten shillings British, which they circulated, and took the difference of change in silver from their customers, until they had got all the currency of the country into their hands. He should therefore move for leave to bring in a bill to restrain the issue and currency of such notes after the first of January next. This, he said, would give the parties who had issued them time for a gradual recal, as well as allow the gentlemen of Ireland time to examine and collect the real sense of their respective counties upon the subject, preparatory to the meeting of the next parliament. The motion was agreed to, and leave was granted to bring in the bill.

Lord Pelham, in the house of lords, on June 17, presented the following message from his majesty:

"GEORGE R.

"His majesty thinks it right to inform the house of lords, that from an anxious desire to prevent the calamities of war being extended to the Batavian republic, he communicated to that government his disposition to respect their neutrality, provided that a similar disposition was manifested on the part of the French government, and that the French forces were forthwith withdrawn from the territories of the Batavian republic. This proposition not having been acceded to by the government of France, and measures having been recently taken by them in direct violation of the independence of the Batavian republic, his majesty judged it expedient to direct his minister to leave the Hague; and he has since given orders, that letters of marque and general reprisals should be issued against the Batavian republic and its subjects.

"His majesty has at all times manifested the deepest and most lively interest for the prosperity and independence of the United Provinces: he has recourse to these proceedings with the most sincere regret, but the conduct of the French government has left him no alternative; and in adopting these measures, he is actuated by a sense of what is due to his own dignity, and to the security and essential interests of his dominions. "G. R."

Lord Pelham moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, thanking him for his gracious communication." Ordered.

The same message was read, and the address, moved by lord Hawkesbury, in the house of commons, on the same day.

Next day, in the house of lords, lord Hobart read another message from his majesty, as follows:

"GEORGE R.

"His majesty thinks it proper to acquaint the house of lords, that for the more effectual defence of the united kingdom against the avowed designs of the enemy, and for the purpose of providing such means as may be best calculated for a vigorous prosecution of the war, his majesty deems it important that a large additional force should be forthwith raised and assembled.

"His majesty recommends this subject to the consideration of their lordships, and relies with confidence on their zeal and public spirit, that they will adopt such measures as upon this occasion shall appear to them to be most effectual, and for carrying the same into execution with the least possible delay. "G. R."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer also delivered a message from his majesty to the same purport, in the house of commons; which being read, he moved, that the message should be referred to a committee of the house, which was agreed to nem. con.

It became now a main object of consideration, as the country had been threatened by invasion, how to prevent the threats of the enemy taking place. For this end in the council it had been determined, that some speedy measure should be resorted to, and to this purpose his majesty's message had been sent to parliament, who met on the 18th of June, to determine on the most effectual means to repel the ambitious projects of the first consul, by taking his majesty's message into consideration, for THE DEFENCE OF THE COUNTRY.

In the house of lords, lord Hobart deemed it his duty, in consequence of the situation he held, (that of secretary of state;) to throw out a general outline of the intentions of government with respect to the object of the address, and the pledge he meant it should contain. In the last war, he said, there were raised for the militia one hundred and fourteen thousand three hundred and eighty-six men, including Scotland. The number of men now raised for the established and supplementary militia, amounted to seventy-two thousand nine hundred and sixty-three men, to which it was proposed by the present plan to add forty thousand for Great Britain: this would make the whole force for this country amount to one hundred and twelve thousand nine hundred and sixty-three men, being one thousand four hundred and twenty-three less than during the last war. With respect to the measure itself, it was the intention of his majesty's ministers, that the army to be raised should consist of forty thousand men for Great Britain, and the islands of the Channel (Guernsey and Jersey), and ten thousand for Ireland. It was intended the men should be raised, on the principle of the militia, by ballot, and that they should be taken out of the counties and districts, with the addition of such volunteers as thought proper to offer their services, and enrolled for Great Britain, Ireland, and the islands in the Channel. The age of the persons to be raised, from eighteen to forty-five.

in

The Duke of Clarence could not approve of the principle even of the general outline of what the noble secretary of state had proposed; but he candidly owned, that it was less objectionable than what the public at large had reason to expect. The country was now entering upon a war with perfect unanimity. Every one was convinced of its justice. It was not Malta that was the cause; it was the restless and arrogant spirit of the tyrant that governed France, that had forced us to go to war. It behoved all who entertained a respect and veneration for the laws and constitution, which had been handed down by our ancestors, to meet the danger with courage and intrepidity.

The Earl of Carnarvon spoke in terms of the highest censure on the mode of recruiting, and the general plan of the measure proposed by ministers, and in conclusion observed, that when ministers, unfit for their stations, harrass the country with these absurd projects, the interests of the nation must suffer, and discontents, and probably resistance to their measures, might arise when nothing but unanimity ought to prevail.

The Earl of Suffolk was confident every thing had been done by his majesty's ministers that ought to have been done, but he wished to know whether their plan embraced the whole country, as well as Ireland. He had proposed five years ago, that there should be a military survey, and that twenty thousand men should be raised and placed in the centre of the country. He was of opinion, a force should be assembled, which, by means of carriages, might be at any point of attack in thirty hours.

Earl Moira said, the danger of the crisis was so great, that the energies of the people must be called out to enable the country to repel it, and not only act defensively but offensively. That the people were willing to stand forth, if they were properly called upon, but it was not by half measures, or common-place measures that any good could arise. The urgency of affairs required action and not discussion. There had been too much tardiness and procrastination already, and it was wonderful that ministers were now only commencing their career. The enemy had been wise enough to pursue a very different line of conduct from us, and had been already suffered to strike a blow, by stripping his majesty of Hanover and the whole of his electorate. Hanover was of considerable importance to the interests of Great Britain, it secured to us an opportunity of attacking the enemy at the back, while we were annoying him in the front by sea; besides, it secured to us the important circumstance of having Hamburgh open to our commerce. These advantages had been snatched from us, without ministers taking any one means to resume and preserve Hanover, which they might easily have done, as they must have long foreseen that in case of a rupture the first blow that the enemy would aim at us, would be to seize upon his majesty's electorate, and thereby enable them to shut our commerce out from Hamburgh, the Elbe, and the Weser. Means of retaliation ought to be found. There were openings to assail and injure the enemy, and deeply too, that yet remained. Let ministers then make up for their erroneous system, by adopting one of vigour and energy, proportionate to the urgency of the cause.

The Duke of Richmond recommended it to ministers to employ a number of cavalry in the defence of the country. Our troops of horse were very fine ones, and the horses of this kingdom, of which we had great plenty, some of the finest in Europe, whereas the men to be raised were all infantry. Now, he thought cavalry the most efficient force that could be opposed to the enemy in such a country as England, particularly where no invading general could derive such fame as Dumourier did, from the tactics he displayed in the forest of Ardennes; or, Moreau, in the retreat which will immortalise his name. He would also suggest the propriety of augmenting the horse artillery. It was a force too obviously useful to be neglected by government. With regard to the raising forty thousand men by ballot, his grace repeated it, that he doubted of its practicability. The last supplementary militia regiments were not yet completed. His own regiment was deficient two hundred men, and they were extremely difficult to be got. The duke voted for the address.

Earl Fitzwilliam observed, that the effect of raising so many militia, exclusive of the disadvantage of their not being applicable to general service, put an end to the regular recruiting service of the army. His lordship took notice of what the Duke of Richmond had said, respecting the two hundred men being deficient in his regiment of militia; the same was the case, he said, in the regiments for the north and west ridings of the county of York.

Lord Grenville agreed with the noble duke, and could not but join with those who complained of the want of activity of ministers on not coming earlier forward with this or some more efficient measure of defence.

Lord Hobart spoke in reply to the accusations against his majesty's ministers, and retorted severely upon lord Grenville under whose administration the whole continent was separated from English influence.

Lord Sheffield concluded the debate by saying, that in voting for the address, he wished not to be supposed to agree that the plan of defence proposed was the best that could be selected; on the contrary, it appeared to him as inadequate to the object, and inexpedient as to the means; and if the ballot was not to take place without any exemptions, it would be the most oppressive, provoking, and expensive that could have been chosen. He considered that if the proposition passed into a law, upwards of one hundred and twelve thousand men, for whom there had been a ballot, would be called out within three months; and if the number should ever be complete, which he much doubted, that the wives and families of those men must all fall on their parishes.

At length the question was put, and the address agreed to.

In the house of commons, after the Secretary at War, had in the course of a long, and intelligent speech, proposed the plan of defence, Mr. Windham, in the most pointed manner, combated every measure which ministers had pursued. He said, the measure now proposed, in his opinion, would only aggravate our difficulties, and tend completely to cut up the recruiting for the regular army. The quantity of men now proposed, was not in proportion to the necessity of the case, nor to the population of the united country. We have already an army of militia, and this measure was intended to augment it and make a ruinous competition between the two services. After taking a view of the arguments adduced in the debate, he concluded by saying, I am sorry to be under the necessity of thus objecting to the only mode of raising a force which ministers have proposed; and must enter my protest against it, so far as it tends to cut up the regular army. Upon the whole, it is the most impolitic step that could be taken in the present situation of the country.

In reply to Mr. Windham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that as to the right honourable gentleman's revision of the militia system, he would say that this was not the proper time for that discussion, could he suppose it possible to recruit a regular army to the number of fifty thousand men without resorting to means of compulsion.

Mr. Pitt expressed his sincere concurrence in the sentiments of the chancellor of the exchequer, and his entire approbation of the principle of the plan before the committee, but that he disapproved of some of its provisions.

After some further observations from Messrs. Windham, Pitt, the Secretary at War, sir W. Young, &c. the address was agreed to.

The house next resolved itself into a committee of Ways and Means, when Mr. Corry submitted to their attention, the state of Irish finance, and observed that the policy adopted by Great Britain, must be acknowledged by all persons persons of discrimination in Ireland; and the newness of the war, with other circumstances, rendered it necessary to demand those charges on that country, which none could be inclined to refuse; he should only state what had been adopted as the best measure that could be chosen. The charges consisted of those which she bore separately, and which did not interfere with this country. He entered into a statement of the situation of the financial concerns of Ireland since last December, and observed, that the trade had been considerably in favour of that country during the last year. He had pledged himself upon former occasions, that the exports of Ireland would be increased; which had been the case. The demand for provisions, he understood, last year, was twenty-five thousand pounds. Corn had also produced from thirty thousand pounds to fifty thousand pounds. He trusted, that during the present year, the fleets and armies would be supplied with the articles last mentioned; however war might be disliked, it was a happiness to reflect that we had resources in Ireland to support it. There never had been seen such a prospect of flax as during the last year, nor so much pains taken to cultivate it. The revenues last year had increased since the year before considerably. He was sorry to say, tobacco and sugar had fallen off in the exports. He then stated, the means by which the charges on the present occasion were to be raised, which after a slight opposition were agreed to.

The grand debate on national defence in the house of commons, took place on the 23d of June, when the whole force of each party seems to have been collected, and the greatest effort of argument and elocution exerted on the subject.

When the Secretary at War moved for the second reading of the bill for the Army of Reserve, Mr. Calcraft regretted that he should in the least degree delay a proceeding, the object of which was, the defence of the country; but, feeling that it was a measure not calculated to meet the exigency of our present situation, he should be compromising his duty to the house, and degrading himself in his own estimation, if he did not take the earliest opportunity of stating his sentiments.—He thought, that the mode by ballot, adopted with respect to fencible regiments, should be had recourse to, to fill up the regiments of the line. The country required strong measures, and if there was any odium attached to the recommendation of what he proposed, he must be content to come in for his share of it. We were now going to take fifty thousand men from the ranks, for the same purposes that fencible regiments were raised.

Mr. Sheridan observed he was as much for strong, bold, and vigorous measures as his honourable friend; but when he talked of ballotting for the line, and having recourse to compulsory service, he could not possibly agree in sentiment with him. The whole power and property of the country were in the hands of government, for its defence; but it would be a most unconstitutional stretch of authority to send people abroad against their consent. The government had no right to force a man, by ballot, into a regiment of the line; such a plan would be reversing every principle upon which the British constitution and government were founded.

Mr. William Elliott opposed the bill, and referred to the ample means the northern parts of Scotland afforded of providing troops for the line, and censured a system adopted some years ago, of raising five thousand militia in that country, locking them up, and not suffering them to advance beyond the borders.

The Secretary at War observed, it would be found, that in the course of the last year, and particularly within the last five or six months, there had been an infinitely larger number of recruits for the regular army than usual, although the recruiting for the militia had been going on during the whole of that time. He could state, that during the last year there had been obtained as many recruits as from one thousand to one thousand two hundred a month. He trusted it would be considered that this bill was the best measure that could, under the present state and circumstances of the country, be adopted. It was the most effectual measure, because it was calculated to raise the greatest number of men within the shortest time, and because he could not, for constitutional reasons, think of resorting to any compulsory measure for the purpose of recruiting the regular army.

Mr. Pitt said, he considered this bill as not only being that which appeared to furnish the most prompt and efficacious mode of giving us that which we first wanted, a defensive army against projected invasion, and for laying the foundation of a disposable force, by which we might avail ourselves of any opening that might present itself of striking a blow against the assailing enemy. This bill, if properly modified, he was persuaded, would give the country a well-grounded hope of raising a much larger army for our internal defence, and eventually for general purposes, than could be done by any other system whatever.

Mr. Windham thought, that even a less force brought into the line gradually, would place the country in a safer state than could be effected by the greater force now in contemplation. The danger was said to be immediate; but should it come upon us even so late as a distance of two months, what he would ask, in the name of common sense, is to be our situation? The bill was not yet passed, and the house had not yet advanced beyond the theory. What will be the nature of this force when raised? It will be a discordant force, composed of men taken away from their business and their families, full of soreness and dissatisfaction; and yet such was the force that was to constitute our last hope, and to be called the Army of Reserve of England. This is the army that is to step in after every other shall be defeated, and upon which the fate of the country is ultimately to depend. He concluded by saying, that though he did not despair of seeing the militia perform the most glorious and distinguished services, yet his general opinion was against the present measure; and therefore he felt it his duty thus openly to express his disapprobation.

Lord Castlereagh observed, the bill was not mandatory upon government to employ unfit persons; and that therefore he approved of the present plan.

Doctor Lawrence said, that the fate of the country depended upon raising its spirit, and calling forth its energies, and that such an effect was only to be produced by discussions in that house. He was convinced, that fifty thousand men, raised as a militia, would not do to go upon regular service; he thought it possible to obtain a regular force by other means than those which had been already adopted.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer assured the house, that he should be as ready as any man to employ any means, however violent or strong they might at other times justly be considered, for the defence of the country. But before the necessity arrived, we must not proceed to that extreme point. Our situation was by no means such as to warrant such an extremity as to force the people of the country to join the regular troops, to leave their homes, their occupations, and connections, and embark for military service in all quarters of the world. There were means, he said, sufficient to render this country impregnable, and these means would be made use of. For his own part, he felt confident, let the enemy meditate and prosecute any projects he may think proper, against the credit or the coasts of this country, they would all prove equally fruitless, and be attended with nothing better than shame, disgrace, and ruin.

The bill went through its various stages, and ultimately passed.

The month of July commenced with some of those busy measures which the extraordinary conduct of the chief consul had occasioned. All Europe seemed to feel, though afraid to confess, the situation into which it had been forced, by the consular edict for shutting up the months of the Elbe and the Weser. It was very soon discovered, that the occupation of those rivers by French troops, was much more injurious to the Continent than to England; for it evidently appeared that few continental merchants were possessed of sufficient capitals to sustain such a chasm in trade, without considerable loss or total ruin, on account of the stock, which for want of commercial communication, was left upon their hands; whilst British patriotism and British resources were alike great; public assistance was always at hand to prevent the destruction or inconvenience of individual branches of commerce from accidental causes. It is well known, that the short stoppage of communication in 1801, was productive of immense confusion on the continent, whilst the productions of British ingenuity and industry, from their goodness, their worth, their taste, and their cheapness, became absolutely requisites to every class of society; whilst coffee, sugar, &c. besides the productions of British colonies, were unequivocal necessaries in every part of Europe.

Though the conduct of France, considered in a commercial cial point of view, might cause a temporary stagnation in a few branches of the British articles of trade; its effects would be most seriously felt, where, probably, it was least intended; for, on the continent, it would certainly be productive of confusion, scarcity, bankruptcy, wretchedness, and ruin; and instead of producing, as was intended, a commercial revolution against British trade, it would only be productive of commercial anarchy on the continent.

Whilst the governor of the French republic was endeavouring to effect the disorganization of the world, the premeditated flattery offered by his subjects, was beyond comparison. Thus the members of the council general of the department of the Seine and Oise conveyed their ebullitions: "Citizen chief consul and president, the English government, the violator of treaties, the tyrant of the seas, the plunderer of commerce, still wishes for war! To this perfidious provocation the French people will reply only by shouts of honour and the vengeance of victory. You are the chief of the great nation to which nothing is impossible. Our legions opened a passage through the Alps, to conquer at Marengo. A strait cannot prevent them from conquering Albion. One day will be sufficient to convey them to its astonished shores. The means of reaching them, France presents to you by unanimous concert. This offer has no other principles or rules than the most complete devotion, and the desire of peace, of that peace sworn to and violated by the enemy, and which you will not restore to them till you have reduced them to such a state that they shall never in future be able to break it. Such are the wishes of the council general of the department of the Seine and Oise, who, to second your glorious projects, have unanimously voted the offer of one million two hundred thousand francs, (fifty thousand pounds) which we have the honour to address to you."

The British ministry, notwithstanding the thunders and storms which were so diffusely levelled against them, were not in the least neglectful of their duty, they considered, that as the first consul had in an unprovoked manner, invaded Hanover, and occupied the shores of the rivers, by hostile measures, to injure the mercantile concerns of their government, they were fully justified in using every means to counteract his intentions, and therefore, still attending to the rules of moderation, on the 8th July, issued the following proclamation for blocking up the mouth of the Elbe:

"Downing-street, June 28.

"The king has been pleased to cause it to be signified by the right honourable lord Hawkesbury, his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, to the ministers of neutral powers residing at this court, that the necessary measures have been taken by his majesty's command, for the blockade of the entrance of the river Elbe, in consequence of the forcible occupation of parts of the banks of that river by the French troops; the said river is declared to be in a state of blockade; and that from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between his majesty and the different neutral powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockade.—Lord Hawkesbury has been further commanded by his majesty, to signify to ministers of the neutral powers, that whenever the French troops will evacuate the positions which they now occupy on parts of the banks of the Elbe, and will remove to such a distance from them, as to leave the course of that river perfectly free and secure to the vessels of his subjects, as well as of other nations, his majesty will immediately direct his ships of war, which may be stationed at the mouth of the river Elbe, for the purpose of blockading the same, to be withdrawn."

This measure of retribution on the part of the British ministry proved, that though they did not fear the menacing projects of their enemy, they promised every satisfactory explanation to neutral powers; they were compelled to seek redress by such means only; and though they felt the decreased value of their Hanoverian alliance, they did not make it a consideration, in comparison with the welfare of Europe.

In the mean time, the states of Europe stood still, astonished and confounded!—they might be inclined to resent; but were afraid to act: they, therefore, suffered what they did not dare to resist, and silently beheld the injury of their neighbours, to whom they dared not give the smallest assistance, lest the chief consul's mercenaries should levy similar contributions on their dominions, and thus reduce them to an equally pitiable situation.

The Hanoverian army, however, finding that the faith of their French intruders was of no duration, and probably experiencing contrition for so easily exchanging a mild government for one that was rapacious and arbitrary, began to shew signs of resistance to the invasive depredations of Mortier's army; but their repentance was too late; their fate was determined, and they were compelled to submit to the hard conditions imposed by their conquerors and masters. They were considered as prisoners, on the condition of not serving against France during the war; they were suffered to go to their several homes, but all their arms, ammunition, &c. were given up to the enemy. The Hanoverian soldiery, with reluctance, yielded to such humiliating conditions, and general Walmoden, to use the words of Mortier, "signed the instrument with a heart torn with grief!"

We have before mentioned, that application had been made on the part of Bonaparte to his Britannic majesty, that he would consent to the depredations of his electoral dominions, by a ratification of the convention between that government and general Mortier; for this purpose Talleyrand transmitted a letter to lord Hawkesbury.

It appears that orders had also been sent to Mortier, to announce to the Hanoverian general, that the first consul would make no difficulty to ratify the articles of the convention which had been held at Suhlingen, as soon as the king of Great Britain should do the same on his part. But from the considerations formerly stated, his majesty, with a patriotic self-denial, refused to accede to proposals derogatory to the dignity of his crown, or profess himself an aggressor, when it was plain to every understanding, that he was the aggressed. Lord Hawkesbury, therefore, remitted a reply to M. Talleyrand, in which he says, that his Britannic majesty, "in his character of elector of Hanover, will scrupulously abstain from every act which may be considered as contravening the stipulations contained in the convention which was concluded on the 3d of June, between the deputies appointed by the regency of Hanover, and the French government."

So pointed a refusal in lord Hawkesbury's reply, to comply with what the chief consul had so much at heart; and "which," as their own journals state it, "not a single man of sense in Europe, who could have doubted for one moment, that the king of England would have ratified," affected the chief consul's temper of mind very forcibly; he therefore remitted orders to Mortier, that the proceedings of the convention at Suhlingen were null and void, and commanded him to act accordingly. Thus instructed, Mortier communicated to general Walmoden the commission he had received. After which general Mortier, in a few days, sent a dispatch to the first consul, in which he stated the particulars of his proceedings. This letter fixed the resolution of the first consul: he found himself obliged, he said, to regard the convention as void, and in consequence, he commanded Mortier to sign articles of capitulation immediately, without being submitted to ratification by either of the two governments. The articles were therefore immediately signed, and Hanover was annexed to France.

The situation of England at this time was as prosperous as it was enviable; all ranks flocked to ensure the safety of their country; and it was a gratifying prospect to behold with what energy, and patriotism they formed themselves into a national guard to repel the audacious menace of invasion. The citizens of London stood forward at this crisis, in a distinguished manner. The volunteer system received every encouragement; and the government gave every assistance to the plan; which was transfused into the remotest parts of the nation.

To give vigour to this disposition, as well as to afford a further incitement to the spirit of the country, which had so eminently manifested itself by the efficient manner in which the volunteer corps of cavalry and infantry was conducted, lord Hobart transmitted circular papers of regulations to the lords lieutenants of counties.

Every measure indeed, which the British government adopted at this time, proved that they were neither inactive nor spiritless. Their plans for raising the supplies, their modes of defending the country were bold, vigorous, and daring; whilst the recent blockade of the Elbe, evidently proved what the power of Great Britain might be, when fully exerted.

But the natives of Britain did not shew their unanimity to support the cause of their nation, by merely arming in its defence; their treasures were opened not only to assist the exigences of government; but to establish funds for the relief of the relatives of such as might unfortunately suffer in the protection of their country. On the 20th of July, a large body of merchants, underwriters, and other subscribers to Lloyd's Coffee House, met for the purpose of setting on foot a general subscription on an extended scale, for the encouragement and relief of such as might be engaged in the defence of the country, and who might suffer in the common cause; and of such as might signalize themselves during the present most important contest. Brook Watson, Esq. was in the chair. Several resolutions were passed unanimously; and to the lasting honour of such a respectable body be it recorded, that the subscriptions at this place only, amounted in the course of ten days to ninety-four thousand two hundred and twelve pounds four shillings and sixpence, exclusively of what was collected in the different wards, and the other parts of the metropolis.

The excellent establishment of the sea fencibles, before-mentioned, now took place. This was intended to comprize all fishermen, and other persons employed in the ports and on the coast, who, from their occupations, were not liable to be impressed for government service: forty-eight post captains, and a proportionate number of lieutenants, were appointed to conduct this important service, from which, and from its arrangement, the most beneficial purposes were expected. The different rendezvous of this force were disposed in the following order: Shoreham, four captains; Hastings, New Romney, Dover, Ramsgate, Margate, Maldon, Harwich, Aldborough, Yarmouth, Lynn, Boston, Barton, Hull, Whitby, Hartlepoole, Berwick and Leith, three captains each; Breding, Stokes Bay, Poole, Weymouth, Exmouth, Dartmouth, Fowey, Falmouth and Haverford West, three captains each; St. Mary's, Scilly, Minehead and Swansea, two captains each. This formation of the sea fencibles bids fair, in case of an attempt to invade the country, to be of the greatest service in annoying the enemy, and discomfiting his measures.

It is with great regret, however, after exhibiting so interesting an account, that we are compelled to reverse the scene in contemplating the affairs of Ireland. A system of degradation and grievance, whatever the ostensible pretensions to the contrary, has certainly been the prevailing policy of the English government towards the Irish, from the time of their conquest by Henry II. to a very recent period. The unhappy consequence of which has been a jealousy of the power that illiberally excluded, instead of affording equal protection; and a fear originating from the harsh treatment administered upon the least symptom of a justifiable disaffection. A violation of public faith, a contempt for all decency and right, and a marked indifference for the comforts, the prejudices, the property, and even the lives of the great bulk of the Irish nation, had been manifested, with very few exceptions, by those who had been entrusted with the management of its general concerns. Surely then a people so circumstanced, so oppressed, could not but be affected by a sense of their depressed situation. An immoderate passion for theoretical systems, fomented by the French revolution, was introduced and entertained, and inflicted in Ireland its most cruel ravages. This malady, however deplorable the state of the country, affected only the lower classes; those of more exalted ranks in life, though they regretted the aggravated insult, bestowed on their country, only hoped for better times, and exerted their influence in maintaining the loyalty of their oppressed fellow-subjects, and in conciliating to their feelings, those acts of the legislature to which they were compelled to yield. Among the other orders of people, publications, derogatory to the interests of monarchy, though delusive in their positions, yet operated to excite doubt, to countenance disaffection, and to rouse that doubt and disaffection into revolt and rebellion. But instead of using the prudence and management which might have reclaimed the insurgents, and restored to their government the misled populace of a distracted country; the measures pursued were unjust, revolting to the dictates of humanity, and rigorous without restriction.

Martial law, indiscriminate punishments, and inquisitorial means, were used to extort confessions, which had probably no ground, but in the torments of the sufferers; these proceedings hunted the Irish into wilds and mountains, whence, assuming the demeanour of their ancestors, they burst forth in parties of desperadoes, and scoured the country where they could trust to no security, and were excluded every hope of pardon.

Had such of these proscribed beings as were casually seized, been treated with magnanimity, such a conduct might have operated, at least, to have excited gratitude, and returning loyalty; but, on the contrary, they were loaded with ignominy, whipped like slaves, and immolated like savage beasts. Conduct like this irritated beyond reparation; and though the rebellion was subdued by military force, the tempers of the relatives to the slain were fixed in disaffection; and when to this was joined what they were taught to imagine the religious and civil rights of their country, they only waited an opportunity to wreak their vengeance, and again hurl their country into confusion and massacre.

A circumstance has been mentioned, not very easily to be accounted for, on any other ground than that of negligence, as inconceivable as it is reprehensible, which had nearly deprived the crown of its most valuable appendage, and Great Britain of its best support.

A rabble promiscuously assembled, of little account in point of numbers, and of less in talents and discipline, threw the metropolis of Ireland into the utmost confusion; if they had been better marshalled and less impetuous, had the conduct and arrangement of the enterprize borne any proportion to the boldness of the design, the condition of subject and sovereign might probably have been reversed, and government felt the necessity of submission to a revengeful populace who had experienced oppression; but happily, the execution was as pitiful as the plan was gigantic; and to this circumstance alone, the salvation of Ireland at this time, is to be attributed. The good effects of the Union had not yet been understood—its benevolent principles had not been investigated; and as it would be unjust to attribute to any one cause, the evils which Ireland in general had suffered, we must generally ascribe those calamities to a concatenation of occurrences, as inexplicable in themselves, as their consequences were horrible. Be these circumstances as they may, they were productive of a riot in Dublin, which exhibited the most savage atrocity.

On the 21st of July, and the day following, it had been observed, that the roads leading from the county of Kildare into Dublin, were frequented by more than an ordinary proportion of travellers of the lower class of people; and the day after, the district of the city upon that side called the Liberty, wore a very suspicious appearance. Thomas Street and High Street, which are upon the line directly leading to the Castle, were, in a manner, crowded with a great number of suspicious characters. Information having been sent to major Sirr, of these extraordinary circumstances, he dispatched a party of the police, for the purpose of preserving the peace in that quarter: but the police being resisted in the execution of their duty, and finding a disposition to riot, which they were unable to quell, they returned for assistance (k).

By reason of the police officers making their appearance, the rebels suspected their plan was discovered, and that a superior force might be immediately expected to attack them, and hinder them from carrying it into execution. Judging, therefore, that no time was to be lost, they resolved upon immediate action. At this critical moment, about a quarter before eight in the evening, lord Kilwarden's post-chaise had reached the Market House (l), a large detached stone building, standing at the end of Thomas Street, next the Castle. In the carriage were lord Kilwarden, his niece, (Miss Wolfe,) and his nephew, (the Reverend Richard Wolfe.) His lordship was soon recognized; and a mob, hitherto concealed, rushed upon it in every direction, armed with guns, blunderbusses, pikes, swords, &c.

(k) It seems to have been the intention of the rebels to have lain in wait until night—and then, sallying forth, to storm the castle, to take possession of the magazine in Phœnix Park, carry the barracks by assault, and to possess themselves of the artillery at Chapelizod. These points once carried, the whole city of Dublin would be completely in their power; and a more judicious place could not be chosen for the purpose, than Thomas Street, which is in the centre of all these points. The Castle is distant from it about a furlong; the barracks about a quarter of a mile; the magazine in the park, half a mile; and Chapelizod, about a mile and a half.

(l) Lord Kilwarden had, a few hours before, set out for his country seat at Newlands, but was overtaken by an express, recalling him; and had reached Thomas Street, upon his return, shortly after the party of police had retired.

Some

Some seized the horses by the head, and dragged the postilion from his seat; while others rushed to each side of the carriage, and opened the doors; Miss Wolfe sat between her uncle and brother, who were dragged out from her side, one from each door, by the banditti. In a state of distraction, Miss Wolfe jumped out, and was received in the arms of one of the party, who carried her through the crowd unhurt, to an opposite house, where she remained until four o'clock on the following morning, when she was conveyed to the Castle, where she remained. While some of the most ferocious were dragging Lord Kilwarden and Mr. Wolfe out of the carriage, others were employed in murdering them. Lord Kilwarden was carried to the watch-house in Vicar Street, where major Swan saw him lying on the guard-bed, dreadfully lacerated. His lordship, although nearly expiring at the time, knew the major, and appeared perfectly in his senses. He eagerly enquired as to the fate of his niece, and being assured by the major of her safety, he exclaimed, with an emotion of gratitude to Heaven—"thank God!"

The alarm being immediately given, the drums beat to arms through the city, and the military marched in all directions to the scene of riot. A party of soldiers from the castle came up, and charged the rebels with great spirit; but, being overpowered by numbers, and the rebels keeping up a strong and well-directed fire, they were repulsed with loss. This party consisted of a detachment of the twenty-first regiment, under the command of colonel Brown and major Stewart; the remainder of the regiment coming up at this moment, and being further aided by a strong detachment of yeomanry, the whole rallied, and charged the rebels again, but were again repulsed. The military, taken by surprize, had brought but a few rounds of ammunition, consequently, as soon as that was expended, they were obliged to resort to the bayonet. The rebels, on the other hand, being well armed with pikes, stood this charge with firmness, and repulsed the soldiery a second time. Fresh forces, however, continually pouring in, the army rallied, and made a third vigorous charge. A most desperate fight now commenced. The rebels were driven back the whole length of Thomas Street; but, in the mean time, rebel succours were coming up from various parts of the liberty, on the rear of the army, who, to avoid being surrounded, fell back again towards the castle. The rebels pressed upon them, until they came into a narrow space, where they could not bring their whole force to bear with effect, while a terrible fire was kept upon them by fresh forces of the army and yeomanry. The rebels, unable to make head, at length retreated in all directions, leaving behind a great number of their dead in the streets. The battle lasted from a quarter after eight, until nearly eleven; during all which time, the king's forces had not only to contend with the rebels in the streets, but also with great numbers who were stationed in the houses, and fired upon them from the windows; while others fired or threw down bricks and stones from the roofs. It is thought more of the military were killed by the rebels from the houses, than by their opponents in the streets. In the number of killed was colonel Brown of the twenty-first, which regiment bore the brunt of the action, and, of course, suffered most. During the remainder of Saturday night, all the principal streets of Dublin, and the principal avenues leading to it, were guarded by the military, consisting of the troops of the line, militia, yeomanry, and volunteers. A double guard was placed upon the castle, and several pieces of artillery were stationed at the several gates. A strong force also continued to parade througn Thomas Street and other parts of the liberty. Several men were killed or wounded by shots from the windows or tops of the neighbouring houses, but no farther riot took place, and several of the disaffected were secured. In this manner passed the remainder of Saturday night. On Sunday morning the dead bodies of the rebels were taken up in the streets, and several carts were employed in carrying them to the castle-yard, for the purpose of having them identified. In the number were several women, who were found with pikes and stones in their hands. As the charge of these persons were irregular and tumultuous, it does not appear that they had any commander. The rebels who had been taken and lodged in the various prisons and watch-houses were then examined, and in consequence of discoveries made by some of them, a vast number of pikes were found in an extreme part of the liberty, called Dolphin's Barn, and also in several parts of that district of the liberty called the Coombe.

The privy council was immediately assembled, and sat a considerable time, when additional precautions were taken for the preservation of the city; and the yeomanry appeared every where in great numbers, ready to act. The consequence of the deliberations of the council, was the publication of a spirited proclamation, which was dispersed the next day, offering, "as a reward, the sum of one thousand pounds sterling, for each and every of the first three persons who shall be apprehended and convicted" of the murder of lord Kilwarden, or his nephew the rev. Richard Wolfe; and his majesty's most gracious pardon for all except the persons who actualiy committed the murders. The same proclamation strictly enjoined and commanded all his majesty's subjects, in their several stations, and according to their several duties, to use their utmost endeavours to suppress all such rebellious and treasonable practices as had taken place, and to apprehend and bring the persons engaged therein to the punishment due to their crimes; and more especially it enjoined and commanded the lord-mayor of the city of Dublin, and all the justices of the peace of the said city of Dublin, and of the county of Dublin, and all sheriffs and other magistrates and officers within their several jurisdictions, and all other his majesty's loving subjects, to do all acts in their power to such purposes. And also, it is further required and commanded, that all officers commanding his majesty's forces employ the troops under their command in the most speedy and effectual manner, for the suppression of all rebellious insurrections and treasonable practices, wherever the same may appear, and particularly to disarm all rebels, and recover all arms forcibly and traitorously taken from his majesty's peaceable and loyal subjects, and take and seize all arms and ammunition, which may be found in the custody of any person or persons, not duly authorised by law to have and keep the same.

The magistracy of Dublin were equally vigilant; they immediately called a board, and published a resolution, purporting, that from the recent disturbances which disgraced that city, the magistracy felt it a duty incumbent on them to put the insurrection acts in force, as during the late rebellion, and therefore thought proper to apprize the inhabitants thereof; and required them not to be out of their respective habitations after eight o'clock at night, as prescribed by those acts. In consequence of these spirited exertions, the most prompt assistance was afforded to government. A party of military and yeomanry, under the command of colonel Brown, attacked a body of rebels in Francis Street, whom they drove before them down the Coombe, with great slaughter; but colonel Brown and two members of the Liberty Rangers, Mr. Edmiston and Mr. Parker, were killed in the conflict; two others were dangerously wounded. Nor did the rebels disperse till many of them were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners.

By the activity of government, depots of various kinds were now discovered: in one was taken thirty thousand pikes; in others, ammunition to a great amount, and made up for various purposes, all after French patterns.

Many suspected persons were taken into custody; and among others a decent dressed man at the corner of Anglesea Street, in College Green, who was supposed to be a French spy. Whatever may have been the intentions of the French government, if they were actually concerned, whether by spies to foment dissension, or by more open hostility to endeavour at the separation of Ireland from the mother country, they were greatly disappointed in their views.

It appears, however, that immediately previous to the insurrectionary explosion, many printed papers were circulated by the rebels; one a short declamatory exhortation, in the style of Sheares's address in the late rebellion, but not so well written; the other large as the page of a newspaper, containing five columns, and entitled, "The Provisional Government of the People of Ireland," so that though the insurrection was happily suppressed, the conspiracy appears to have been most deeply contrived. This was evident from the conduct of the rabble at the mansion house; they attacked the building with fire arms, and having rushed violently in, they threatened to murder every opponent to their plunder of fire-arms, halberts, &c. which they were in search of.

Mr. Wilson, a justice of the peace, and brother to Mr. W. Wilson, a bookseller, had been wounded in the belly in Dirty Lane, by a villain, whom he, however, shot dead upon upon the spot. The same gentleman, with Mr. justice Bell, apprehended seven persons armed with pikes, in New Street, and notwithstanding his wound, to his credit be it recorded, could not be persuaded by his friends to desist from the discharge of his public duty. A number of the rebels attacked the guard-house near justice Drury's, on the Coombe, but by the exertions of the same magistrate, aided by a party of the military, many of them were killed or wounded, and a number taken prisoners. On the retreat of the remainder, they threw down a great many pikes, and fled.

After this exhibition, the scene which presented itself of indiscriminate carnage, was of the most melancholy appearance, all was terror and confusion; and many of the deluded miscreants were seen dead in the different streets. The privy council continued sitting, when additional precautions were taken for the preservation of the city; and the yeomanry appeared every where in great numbers. It does not appear, however, that any atrocities were committed beyond the city bounds, except that a party of the rebels attacked the guard of the mail, between Dublin and Naas, and being resisted, two soldiers unfortunately lost their lives.

On the 30th of June, captain Malbon, of his majesty's ship the Aurora, on the Newfoundland station, made the island of St. Peter's. He sent his large cutter and launch, manned and armed with a twelve pound carronade, under the command of lieutenant Richard Longfield Davies, and lieutenant Baillie, of the marines, to oblige the town to surrender, or begin the attack; they entered the harbour, under a thick fog, and perceiving a boat crossing from one side to the other, brought her to, in which they found the commissary who acted as governor. The confusion that the place was thrown into from the sudden attack, prevented the inhabitants from assembling together, and the commissary surrendered the island, by delivering the colours to lieutenant Davies. From what was afterwards learned, there is no doubt, that if the inhabitants could have had time to have collected themselves from their different situations, they would have made a strong resistance; upwards of one hundred stand of arms having been afterwards found among them. Knowing the small force in the boats, captain Malbon used his utmost efforts to get his majesty's ship into the harbour, but was as frequently prevented by thick fogs; but at length he entered under a heavy press of sail between the rocks, which were not a cable's length across. They found here a French merchant brig (La Reine des Agnes) and a schooner (Le Provoiyer), with eleven small schooners, and upwards of a hundred battoes. St. Peter's contained fish, stores, salt, and merchandize of various descriptions, and, upon a rough survey, about two hundred men were upon the island in the boats, but they being so detached, that several got away in the small craft, one of which was afterwards taken off Liverpool, in Nova Scotia, and another at St. Lawrence, in Newfoundland.

Every thing being secured, captain Malbon ordered one of the fishing schooners to be fitted as a tender, and having her manned and armed with a twelve pound carronade, gave the command to lieutenant Davies, with directions to scour the coast, and take possession of the islands of Great and Little Miquelon, which he did, but neither inhabitants nor stores were found at either of those places.

Captain Wallis, in the Naiad, in the bay of Brest, took on the 5th of July, a French national schooner, called La Providence, bound to Brest, from the foundery at Nantes, and laden with heavy cannon, of thirty-six, twenty-four, and eighteen French pounders, as well as choice timber for their navy. This capture was made, notwithstanding the rapidity of the tide, and the number of rocks and shoals, which it was necessary to pass, but which rendered the exploit extremely dangerous. The schooner, under all these unpropitious circumstances, was brought off without the smallest accident to the boat or men.—Several French privateers and other vessels were also taken and brought into British ports; but these being of minor consequences, it is not necessary to enumerate them.

A fact, rather curious, occurred at this time, the Dart privateer was taken by the Apollo, and in her were the relations of Madame Bonaparte, who had been consigned to the care of captain Thesiger, agent for French prisoners at Porchester. These prisoners were, however, treated with every attention; were allowed to walk abroad, to furnish themselves with necessaries, and had every indulgence consistent with their situation.

An unfortunate circumstance took place, during this month, by the loss of his majesty's ship the Minerva, of thirty-six guns, commanded by captain Brenton. She went on shore in a thick fog, on a rock, near Cherbourg, close under two batteries, which, the moment the fog cleared away, began a very heavy firing. Captain Brenton finding resistance ineffectual, was under the necessity of surrendering; but happily no officer or man on board was either killed or wounded. They were of course made prisoners of war, and marched into the country.

The loss of the Resistance frigate, of twenty-six guns, happened on the first of this month, but the crew were saved. And on the 21st, the Seine frigate, of forty-two guns, having been wrecked on a sand-bank near Scheveling; the officers and crew finding it impossible to get her off, set her on fire.

The loss of of the Lady Hobart Packet, was attended with such circumstances as to render it worthy a particular relation. This vessel, under the command of captain Fellowes, had sailed from Halifax, in North America, on the 22d of June, and about one o'clock in the morning of the 29th, going at the rate of seven knots an hour, struck against an island of ice, with such violence, that several of the crew were pitched out of their hammocks; and, though by extraordinary exertions the crew and passengers were saved, the packet was lost. The conduct of her commander, in the hour of danger, was, however, highly distinguishable for true courage, fortitude, and piety, and the credit in which he was held by the post-masters-general, is fully exemplified by the note which accompanied the return of his dispatches. After requesting captain Fellowes to publish his narrative, of which they speak in the most unqualified terms of approbation, the post-masters general add, "It cannot fail to impress on the minds of all who may read it, the benefit of religion, and the consolation of prayer, under the pressure of calamity; and also an aweful sense of the interposition and mercies of Providence, in a case of extreme peril and distress. To seamen, it will more especially shew, that discipline, order, generosity of mind, good temper, mutual benevolence, and patient exertion, are, under the favour of Heaven, the best safeguards in all their difficulties."

Captain Fellowes' account of this shipwreck, after such an high official encomium, is best recorded in his own words:

"Being roused out of my sleep, by the suddenness of the shock, I instantly ran upon deck. The helm being put hard a-port, the ship struck again about the chest-tree, and then swung round on her heel, her stern-post being stove in, and her rudder carried away, before we could succeed in our attempts to haul her off. At this time, the island of ice appeared to hang quite over the ship, forming a high peak, which must have been at least twice the height of our mast-head; and we suppose the length of the island to have been from a quarter to half a mile.

"The sea was now breaking over the ice in a dreadful manner, the water rushing in so fast as to fill the hold in a few minutes. We hove the guns overboard, cut away the anchors from the bows, got two sails under the ship's bottom, kept both pumps going, and bailing with buckets at the main hatchway, in the hope of preventing her from sinking; but in less than a quarter of an hour she settled down to her fore-chains in the water.

"Our situation now became most perilous. Aware of the danger of a moment's delay in hoisting out the boats, I consulted captain Thomas of the navy, and Mr. Bargus, my master, as to the propriety of making any further efforts to save the ship; and as I was anxious to preserve the mail, I requested their opinion, as to the possibility of taking it into the boat, in the event of our being able to get them over the ship's side. These gentlemen agreed with me, that no time was to be lost in hoisting them out; and that, as the vessel was then settling fast, our first and only consideration was to endeavour to preserve the crew.

"And here I must pay that tribute of praise, which the steady discipline and good conduct of every one on board so justly merit. From the first moment of the ship's striking, not a word was uttered expressive of a desire to leave the wreck: my orders were promptly obeyed; and though the danger of perishing was every instant increasing, creasing, each man waited for his turn to get into the boats, with a coolness and composure that could not be surpassed.

"Having fortunately succeeded in hoisting out the cutter and jolly-boat, the sea then running high, we placed the ladies in the former; one of them Miss Cotenham, was so terrified, that she sprung from the gunwale, and pitched into the bottom of the boat, with considerable violence. This accident, which might have been productive of fatal consequences to herself, as well as to us all, was unattended by any bad effects. The few provisions which had been saved from the mens' births, were then put into the boats, which were quickly veered astern. By this time, the main deck forward was under water, and nothing but the quarter-deck appeared: I then ordered my men into the boats, and having previously lashed iron pigs of ballast to the mail, it was thrown overboard.

"I now perceived the ship was sinking fast; I called out to the men to haul up and receive me, intending to drop myself into the cutter from the end of the try-sail boom, fearing she might be stove under the counter; and I desired Mr. Bargus, who continued with me on the wreck, to go over first. In this instance, he replied, he begged leave to disobey my orders; that he must see me safe over before he attempted to go himself. Such conduct, at such a moment, requires no comment; but I should be wanting to myself and to the service, if I did not faithfully state to their lordships every circumstance, however trifling; and it is highly satisfactory to me, to have this opportunity of recording an incident so honourable to a meritorious officer.

"The sea was running so high at the time we hoisted out the boats, that I scarcely flattered myself we should get them out in safety: and, indeed, nothing but the steady and orderly conduct of the crew, could have enabled us to effect so difficult and hazardous an undertaking; and it is justice to them to observe, that not a man in the ship attempted to make use of the liquor, which every one had in his power. Whilst the cutter was getting out, I perceived one of the seamen, (John Tipper,) emptying a demijean, or bottle, containing five gallons, which, on inquiry, I found to be rum. He said, he was emptying it for the purpose of filling it with water from the scuttle-cask on the quarter-deck, which was generally filled overnight, and which was then the only fresh water to be got at; it became afterwards our principal supply. I relate this circumstance, as being so highly creditable to the character of a British sailor.

"We had scarce quitted the ship, when she suddenly gave a heavy lurch to port, and then went down head foremost. I had ordered the colours to be hoisted at the main top-gallant-mast head, within the distance of three hundred and fifty miles from St. John's, in Newfoundland, with a prospect of a continuance of westerly winds, it became at once necessary to use the strictest œconomy. I represented to my companions in distress, that our resolution, once made, ought on no account to be changed; and that we must begin by suffering privations, which I foresaw would be greater than I ventured to explain. To each person, therefore, were served out half a biscuit, and a glass of wine, which was the only allowance for the ensuing twenty-four hours, all agreeing to leave the water untouched as long as possible. During the time we were employed in getting out the boats, I had ordered the master to throw the main-hatch tarpauling into the water; which being afterwards cut into lengths, enabled us to form a temporary bulwark against the waves. I had also reminded the carpenter to carry with him as many tools as he could: he had accordingly, among other things, put a few nails in his pockets, and we repaired the gunwale of the cutter, which had been stove in hoisting her out. Soon after day-light we made sail, with the jolly-boat in tow, and stood close-hauled to the northward and westward, in the hope of reaching the coast of Newfoundland, or of being picked up by some vessel. Passed two islands of ice, nearly as large as the first. We now said prayers, and returned thanks to God for our deliverance."

After encountering for six days and nights, various gales of wind, and being reduced by famine, to almost the lowest possible state of existence, these victims of distress made Conception Bay, on the coast of Newfoundland, on the 4th of July, about noon.

"At this affecting period," as the captain impressively adds, "though overpowered by my own feelings, and impressed with the recollection of our sufferings, and the sight of so many deplorable objects, I proposed to offer up our solemn thanks to Heaven for our miraculous deliverance. Every one cheerfully assented; and as soon as I opened the prayer book, (which I had secured the last time I went down to my cabin), there was an universal silence; a spirit of devotion was so singularly manifested on this occasion, that to the benefits of a religious sense in uncultivated minds, must be attributed that discipline, good order, and exertion, which even the sight of land could scarcely produce."

The wind having blown with great violence from off the coast, they did not reach the landing-place at Island Cove, till four o'clock in the evening. All the women and children in the village, with two or three fishermen, (the rest of the men being absent), came down to the beach, and appeared deeply affected at the wretched situation of the captain and his company, whom they assisted out of the vessel, and afterwards carried them up the craggy rocks; over which they were obliged to pass, to get to the habitations.

It was a most fortunate circumstance for them, that they fell in with the land about Island Cove; a very few miles further to the northward, the coast is inaccessible, and lined with dangerous reefs of rocks, which, had they seen in the night, they would have pushed for; their situation had become so desperate, that captain Fellowes had resolved to land at the first place he could make; and they in that case must all have perished.

This small village, however, afforded neither medical aid nor fresh provisions; potatoes and salt fish being the only food of the inhabitants. It was determined, therefore, to lose no time in proceeding to St. John's, and a small schooner was hired for that purpose. On the 7th of July, they embarked in three divisions, placing the most infirm in the schooner; the master's mate having charge of the cutter, and the boatswain of the jolly-boat: but such was the exhausted state of nearly the whole party, that the day was considerably advanced before they could get under weigh.

On their arrival at St. John's, the ladies, colonel Cooke, captain Thomas, and captain Fellowes, conducted by Mr. Lilly, off Island Cove, in the jolly-boat, having left the schooner when she anchored, notwithstanding the badness, as well as extreme darkness of the night, reached the shore about midnight. They wandered for some time about the streets, there being no house open at that late hour; but were at length admitted into a small habitation, where they passed the remainder of the night on chairs, there being but one miserable bed for the ladies.

Early on the following day, their circumstances being made known, hundreds of people crowded down to the landing place: nothing could exceed their surprize, on seeing the boats that had carried nine-and-twenty persons such a distance over a boisterous sea; and when they beheld so many miserable objects, they could not conceal their emotions of pity and concern. Captain Fellowes waited on brigadier-general Skerrit, who commanded the garrison, and who immediately, upon being informed of their situation, ordered down a party of soldiers to take the people out of the boats, and with the utmost kindness and humanity, directed beds and every necessary article to be prepared for the crew.

The greatest circumspection was found necessary in administering nourishment to the men. Several of the crew were so much frost-bitten, as to require constant surgical assistance; and it was determined they should continue at St. John's, until they were in a fit state to be transported to Halifax: for which purpose a schooner was hired.

Being anxious to return to England, captain Fellowes engaged the cabin of a small vessel bound to Oporto; and on the 11th of July, embarked with Mrs. Fellowes, colonel Cook, captain Thomas, Mr. Bargus, the master, and the colonel's servant, who, during the voyage home, lost several of his toes, in consequence of what he had suffered. The master's mate was left in charge of the ship's company, and was directed to conduct them to Halifax; whence they would be enabled to return by the first opportunity to their own country.

After taking leave of their hospitable friends at St. John's, and recommending to their protection the companions of their hardships, they put to sea with favourable weather. During a voyage of fifteen days, they met with a few difficulties to encounter, such as pumping continually, the vessel having sprung a leak in a gale of wind; and were obliged to throw overboard a considerable quantity of her cargo of salt fish.

On the 26th of July, they fell in with an American ship, the Bristol Trader, of New York. The owner, Mr. William Cowley, being told of their distressed situation, and that they had been shipwrecked, immediately hove to, and, with a benevolence and humanity that will ever reflect the highest honour on his character, received them on board, and brought them safe to Bristol; at which place they arrived on the 3d of August.

The singular interposition of Providence in the preservation of captain Fellowes, and his company, is wonderfully striking. It is with great pleasure we add, that the whole company and crew, except a French captain, after proper care and attention, had rendered them able to pursue their voyage, arrived at their several destinations. The unfortunate French captain, every reader of sensibility must regret to be informed, threw himself overboard in a fit of delirium, on Sunday, the 3rd of July, the day before they reached the shore.

Instead of venting fulsome deifications, as was now the practice at Paris, the government and people of Great Britain submitted themselves to the protection of that power, "by whom kings reign, and princes decree justice," in a devout appeal to the disposal of Him, "to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid." A form of prayer was ordered to be read in all places of worship, and is still daily repeated.

On the 2nd of July, in consequence of a summons from the lord lieutenant, a meeting of the deputy lieutenants and magistrates of the county of Kent, and the city of Canterbury, was held at the George Inn, Sittingbourne, in order to carry into execution a plan for establishing a system of communication throughout the county, and for rendering the body of the people instrumental to the general defence, in case of invasion. The meeting was numerously attended, there being present the principal noblemen, and a large proportion of the magistracy and gentlemen of the county. When his majesty's warrant appointing the meeting was read, the lord lieutenant, after expressing his thanks for so large an attendance, submitted the following plans for their approbation, which, except with respect to the corps of guides, were severally adopted. The plan for a system of communication, proposed to form the county into four divisions, each to be placed under the charge of a deputy lieutenant, who was to be denominated lieutenant of a division, subject to his majesty's approbation. Earl Camden was appointed for the lathe of Sutton. The earl of Darnley for the lathe of Aylesford. Lord Sondes for the lathe of Scray, and sir Edward Knatchbull, Bart. for the lathes of St. Augustine and Shipway. Each hundred to be in like manner placed under the charge of a competent person (if possible a magistrate), who was to be denominated inspector of the hundred, and each parish to be placed in charge of such resident gentleman, clergyman, or principal farmer, who would engage to superintend the same, and to be denominated Superintendents of Parishes, who were also empowered to select agents to assist them as the extent of the parish might require; all orders to be conveyed through the lieutenants of divisions to the inspectors of hundreds, and through them to superintendents of parishes. Returns to be made agreeable to forms which were to be delivered for that purpose. The proposals for rendering the body of the people instrumental to the general defence, were comprehended under eight general heads, viz. 1. The driving the country within fifteen miles of the coast. 2. Bearing arms, and engaging to assemble when an enemy has landed. 3. Pioneers. 4. Guides. 5. Waggons. 6. Millers. 7. Bakers. 8. Barges. The lords lieutenants of the other counties in the kingdom, held general meetings to resolve on the best modes of security. The county of Somerset addressed his majesty in support of the war. Devon, and all the counties, cities, and corporations, did the same.

The lord mayor of London called a court of aldermen on the 11th, in which passed such spirited resolutions, as were calculated to animate the other parts of the empire. They did not consider the question of support for party; but whether the British constitution was to be overturned, replaced, and superseded, by the politics of a French military dominion.

As the arming of the country was the primary object to be considered, the measures which had been brought under deliberation, to remove all reasonable apprehensions for the public defence, were now carried into effect. The necessity of recurring to the body of the people in the country as its surest protection, was acknowledged and enforced; and a warlike population was considered as the best nursery of a valiant army. The plan, therefore, which had been brought before parliament for training the people to the use of arms, and for better enabling his majesty to call them out in case of invasion, gave general content, because it made no distinction between the great and the humble, nor did it impose a hardship on the former, which must not be borne by the latter. All were exposed to danger; therefore all must be equally secure. Upon such principles, appeared the act for a Levy en Masse.

The Income Tax bill, though amended, did not contain any thing in its principle, to approve of its passing; or to overturn the obloquy which it had deservedly merited; its chief objections still existed, and ought not to have been brought forward as a compulsatory measure, when the public, by subscriptions, by loans, and by every other constitutional means, exerted every nerve to assist the government, which, under these untoward circumstances, they respected (m).

On Monday, July the 27th, in the house of commons, a sum of sixty thousand pounds, and also an annuity of sixteen thousand pounds were granted, in conformity with his majesty's message, to the house of Orange. The sum of sixty thousand pounds to be paid out of the consolidated fund, from which source the annuity was also to be payable. The annuity to be paid at the discretion of the crown, until the affairs of the house of Orange were in too prosperous a state to require such assistance. The foundation of this grant was stated to be our obligations to that house, and the losses which it had sustained in consequence of its attachment to us. It was also strongly urged, that since the treaty of Amiens, the Dutch had offered an indemnity to the prince of Orange, upon condition that the ships surrendered at the Helder, estimated at two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, should be given up to them, but neither the English government, nor the prince of Orange, would listen to the proposition.

A vote of credit of two millions was also granted to the minister in the committee of supply.

Works of national utility also gained their merited consideration. The committee appointed by the house of commons, to consider of erecting a light-house on the Bell or Cape Rock, on the eastern coast of Scotland, near the entrance of the Frith of Forth, proceeded to examine evidence with respect to the situation of the said rock; the benefits which would arise to the trade and navigation of the kingdom, from a light-house thereon; and the practicability of erecting and maintaining the same: from the evidence of the honourable captain Cochrane, of his majesty's navy, of captain James Dunbar, of the royal navy, and of Mr. Murdo Downie, master in the royal navy, (who made a survey and charts of the east coast of Scotland,) it was determined to erect the light-house, which would be the means of saving many vessels from shipwreck.

On the 9th of July, the roof of the center tower, or

(m) An abstract of the bill for levying contributions on the profits of certain descriptions of property, and on professions, trades, &c.

"Of the bill, so far as concerns profits arising from trade or profession, the following will afford an idea of the most prominent clauses:

"Upon all interest of money, annuities, dividends, and shares of annuities; for every twenty shillings of the annual amount thereof, one shilling.

"Upon the annual profits or gains, arising or accruing to any person or persons residing in Great Britain, from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in Great Britain or elsewhere, or from any annuities, allowances, or stipends, or from any profession, trade, or vocation, whether carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere; upon the annual profits, &c. accruing to any of his majesty's subjects, although not resident in Great Britain, or from any professions, &c. exercised there; and upon the annual profits, &c. accruing to any person, although not subjects of his majesty, not resident in Great Britain, from any property whatever in Great Britain, or any trade, &c. exercised there, for every twenty shillings of the amount of such annuities, annual profits or gains, the yearly sum of one shilling.

"Exemptions.—The stock of friendly societies; of charitable institutions; the commissioners for the national debt, and foreigners, (why they should be exempted we are at a loss to say!) are exempted from the first of these enactments.

"From the others, when the profits or annual income is under one hundred and fifty pounds, the following abatements take place:—When under sixty pounds, a total exemption.—When above sixty pounds and under eighty pounds, the sum charged is for every twenty pounds, the annual amount two pence.—Eighty pounds and not exceeding one hundred pounds, three pence.—One hundred pounds, and not exceeding one hundred and twenty pounds, six pence.—One hundred and twenty pounds, and not exceeding one hundred and fifty pounds, nine pence.

"The other clauses, regulations, and modes of assessment, are similar, if not exactly the same, with those concerning the taxation of property, which we formerly laid before our readers.

"Voluntary Contributions from any person or persons, body corporate or politic, towards effecting the purposes of the act, are appointed to be received by the governor and company of the bank of England, and certificates or receipts granted therefore, if required."

rather

rather the lanthorn of Westminster Abbey, was discovered to be on fire. The flames soon assumed a formidable appearance, rising to a considerable height above the parapet. To every person in the vicinity, and to all persons who regarded this venerable pile as the most valuable monument of Gothic architecture, the sight was truly lamentable. Every person was alarmed with the apprehension that the flames, so violent on their first appearance, would quickly spread over the whole of the Abbey, and communicate to the adjacent buildings. The Guards and the Westminster Volunteers were immediately on the spot, assisting to repress the multitude and extinguish the flames. The soldiers and others formed lines to the water side, from whence they handed buckets of water, one to another, along the line, till the buckets reached the Abbey, and were drawn to the top by ropes. Fortunately, however, the high parapet of the tower where the fire commenced, the thickness of the walls, and the nature of the roof, consisting principally of stone arches, opposed a barrier to the destructive element which it was unable to overcome. The mischief was therefore confined to the tower where it originated, but the consequences were still sufficiently distressing. About an hour and a half after the commencement of the conflagration, the roof of the tower fell in, and crushed the wood-work below, being the pews, &c. of that part of the Abbey appropriated to divine worship. The devastation of the venerable pile was happily here at an end; but it became a matter of importance to extinguish the hidden flames of the mass, composed of the fallen roof, the wood-work of the pews, &c. Here it was that the exertions of the firemen, and the power of the engines, which were unavailing, while the flames were confined to the roof of the tower, were found essentially beneficial; and the flames were completely got under in about two hours. The accident was occasioned by the negligence of some plumbers, who went to dinner, leaving their fire unextinguished and insecure (n).

During the late war, sir James Craufurd resided at Hamburgh, in the capacity of Chargé des Affaires from the English court, and held that situation when the celebrated Napper Tandy and his associates arrived, after having made an unsuccessful expedition to the coast of Ireland. Sir James peremptorily demanded of the Senate to deliver these men into his custody, that he might send them to answer the offence they had committed against the laws of their country. The senate remonstrated, on the ground of Hamburgh being a neutral state; alledging, at the same time, that Tandy and his companions were in the French service, and had produced their commissions. These remonstrances, however, could not divert the envoy from his purpose, and he at length succeeded. Tandy and his associates were sent to England, and Bonaparte menaced the Hamburghers for their pusillanimity, and attachment to the British government.

It was to be lamented, however, that sir James, after having been so recently engaged in a business of this kind, should think of taking a tour through the French dominions, in his passage to England, but such unfortunately was the case. He arrived at Calais a few days before the English were placed in a state of arrestation, and had a vessel been ready at the time, might have escaped the general calamity. His baggage, however, was at length shipped, and he applied to the commissary, general Mengaud, for a passport. The answer he received, was delivered in a manner that evinced a determined hostility. "Sir James," said Mengaud, "I did not expect to see you in Calais; but since you are here, I cannot part with you so soon. My actions are generally directed by great examples; you are therefore, Sir, my prisoner."

Sir James remained a few days at Calais on his parole, and was afterwards ordered to Valenciennes.

The deliberations of parliament were mostly a continuation and conclusion of the business which had been brought forward during the month of June, except in a few instances.

On the 4th of July, the house of lords resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, on the Army of Reserve bill. In the course of the debate, the earl of Moira called for an explanation of the meaning of the clause, which, according to his construction of it, appeared to give most unnecessarily a gratuitous exclusion to the substitutes, who had voluntarily entered into regiments of the line, from going abroad, even if they expressed their desire so to do. His lordship said, in the course of the war, it might be thought expedient to attack a fort or military position on the enemy's coast, or to send a regiment or two out to defeat an armament on the sea, and he saw no reason why ministers should deprive themselves of the service of the substitutes admitted into regiments of the line, if they volunteered their services, in the case of their regiments being sent on general service abroad.

Lord Hobart replied, that the clause meant to hold out to all who volunteered, or acted as substitutes for those ballotted for militia-men, that no more should be exacted from them than was originally contracted for. Upon this the earl of Moira moved an amendment, which being negatived, the committee went through the other clauses, and the bill was reported.

When the order for going into a committee on the Income Tax, was moved on the 5th, the sentiments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon colonel Bastard's question, "Whether under any circumstances, landed property can be charged more than five per cent." were to the following purport: in all circumstances, where the owner of land lets it out, only five per cent. was payable, that is, one shilling in the pound. Where the owner of land holds the same in his own hands, and was, in fact, his own tenant, then to pay one shilling and nine pence, that is, one shilling as landlord and nine pence as tenant. An honourable member, (Mr. Alderman Coombe,) had said, that this was neither more nor less than the old income tax revived. This he denied to be the case; for, the difference between that measure and this was, that the present tax was to be applied to the same purposes, and hinges on the same principle as the other, but the mode of collecting it was better, because it was calculated to avoid any disclosure of the circumstances or property of the parties paying the tax. By the mode of charging land and money at interest, no disclosure whatever took place. In a commercial country it was unquestionably most desirable, that no disclosure of circumstances should be made, further than was absolutely necessary to secure the payment of the tax. Another advantage was, that the execution was infinitely more easy and simple to the commissioners than it was before, as persons now will not be in a situation which they would have to decide between their interest and their duty. After consenting to raise eight millions within the year, for the public service, it was necessary that the means of doing so should be as speedily as possible provided. The measure he now submitted to the house was such as he thought would draw fair and equal contributions, by taxing income and other species of property as nearly on a par as possible.

The honourable Mr. Erskine said, that our particular situation must suggest the measures of our conduct; and, though far from wishing to see an income tax re-established, as an ordinary mode of taxation, unless in times of very great difficulty indeed, yet he was ready to say, he thought this was not the time for debating such matters. The country was in a great and aweful crisis; but he did not say this with a view to dismay the national feeling. The enemy had but two modes by which to accomplish their most sanguine expectation for the invasion of this country: the one by pouring in their population. The other was to exhaust our finances, by allowing us to go on with the funding system to carry on the war, which the enemy imagined would terminate in exciting discontents amongst the people of this country, and consequently disunion. He therefore thought that the rich should make up their minds to suffer great privations at this moment; as the more we disappointed the hopes of those who wished to disunite the people of this country, the stronger would be our means of defence. He by no means assented to the principle of this bill as a permanent mode of taxation, but merely as a means of providing against present danger; and he trusted the country would cheerfully acquiesce, and bury all differences of opinion on the subject. This was, in his mind, the arduous moment for the rich to come forward, and shew an example.

On the 8th of July, sir William Scott, in the house of commons, brought forward a measure of great benefit to a (n) The flat and elevated roof at which the accident happened, was constructed almost entirely of stone, and the Gothic pillars of the square, which supported it, were formed of a composition of mortar or stucco-work, the combustible nature of which was principally occasioned by its age. When water was procured, it was conveyed in such torrents over the interior, that the superstratum of the aisles, by absorbing a quantity of the water, sunk in many parts, carrying with it large portions of the pavement, and presenting cavities of a considerable depth. To the elevation of the square roof alone, is the building indebted for it preservation.

useful

useful class of British subjects. He said, that in consequence of the present hostilities between this country and France, he rose to bring in a bill for the encouragement of seamen. The bill was partly of the same nature as the antecedent one he had introduced, and therefore it was unnecessary to say much upon the subject. It was founded on the ancient rules of the admiralty courts, and the vice-admiralty courts, dispersed throughout his majesty's dominions. That gallant body of men, the seamen of Great Britain, had an irresistible claim on the legislature of this country, for every practicable attention that could be paid to their interest. It was a known mark of the character of seamen, that they were not equal to the task of taking care of themselves; his majesty's courts had been long in the habit of thinking for them. This arose from their improvident indiscretion, against the effect of which it was in view to provide, at the same time, breaking in as little as possible upon those principles which left men free to dispose of what they consider as their own. To the present time, they had appointed their own agents and trustees, and revoked the appointment as they thought proper. They had the power of transferring the whole contigent interest they might be entitled to during the war, within a week after its commencement, for any consideration, however inadequate. It had been proposed that there should be a public office erected, with powers for conducting the whole business of prizes on one general system. He could not deny that a principle of this kind would be attended with advantages, but he was not sure that many of those advantages might be obtained from the modification of the system which at present prevailed—a system which left the parties to the nomination of those in whom they confided their interest. Such a system was more natural, because it was more acceptable to those for whose benefit it was intended. The adoption of that system, which left men to the nomination of their own agent, was not all he proposed. He wished to guard the nomination by regulations; it would be a great improvement of the plan, if after agents were nominated by private individuals, they were clothed with a public, legal known character, which rendered them amenable for their conduct. For that purpose, one regulation he should propose was, that on the nomination of an agent, the power of attorney should be immediately registered in the court of admiralty; by which he would be known to the court, and liable to its authority during the whole time. A second regulation was, that at the time of registering the letters of attorney, the agent should give security, in a considerable sum, for the execution of his trust. At present, no security was given, and consequently a seaman might pick up the most needy man he could find, on Portsmouth Point, to be his agent. He should propose likewise, that the agent should be invested with the permanence that belonged to a public character, so long as he exercised it with propriety. Another regulation was, that, upon the institution of any appeal, it should be lawful for the judge of the Admiralty to order in the proceeds, and invest them. With respect to the navy, that question stood in a lamentable way. The money, during the whole time of the appeal, remained in the hands of the agent; in consequence of this, he had an interest adverse to his principal. The evil did not rest there. If the appeal was determined in favour of the captor, the profits of the principal rested with the agent; on the contrary, if the captor was condemned, he was liable to pay the interest. Another regulation was, that, after the time of appeal was elapsed, it should be in the power of the judge of the Admiralty to compel a destribution. There was no power to compel a destribution, but by action at law, or by a bill in chancery. He should submit, whether it would not be more beneficial, that the court should have the power of following up the agent to a full execution of his duty. At present, it had only the power of verifying accounts, or disallowing them; but it stopped at that point where its authority was most required. Another regulation was this, that no seaman should be allowed to make the general power of attorney to which he had adverted, in a way by which he might, for a temporary gratification, convey his whole interest in his future prize-money. It would be highly important, that the power of attorney should be a special power of attorney, appointing the particular source out of which the interest conveyed was to arise. To this he should add another regulation respecting the dates of the prizes. When prizes were made in the West Indies, the seamen were often removed to other ships, and what became of the prizes, whether they were condemned or not, they knew not. He should provide that registers of prizes should be transmitted home every month: he meant a list of all the prizes that had gone through the adjudication of the court. The house would see that he had not pressed this subject beyond what justice demanded; and he was persuaded that the house would, by adopting the regulations he proposed, contribute to the comforts of a class of men whom it was their interest to protect. He concluded by moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for the encouragement of Seamen, and for the better and more effectual manning of his majesty's navy," which was granted.

On the 11th, lord Castlereagh presented the following message from his majesty:

"G. R.

"His majesty thinks proper to acquaint the house of Commons, that in consideration of the eminent services performed in America, by the late Geoffrey, lord Amherst, and particularly in the reduction of Canada, his majesty was induced, on the termination of the war, to grant to lord Amherst, certain tracts of land in that province; but in consequence of some local circumstances, that grant has not been carried into effect. His majesty, therefore, relies on the justice and liberality of the house of Commons, that they will make to lord Amherst such compensation as they shall see fit."

On the motion of lord Castlereagh, the message was ordered to be taken into consideration.

When the bill for enabling the city of London to raise a certain quota of men for the better defence of the country, was moved, on the 12th, to be read a second time, next day, Mr. Price, the lord mayor said, he hoped the house would indulge him while he said a few words, in order to vindicate the city of London from certain imputations that had gone abroad into the world, concerning the number of men that were to form its quota of the new Army of Reserve, and in which it was said that the city did not supply a number proportioned to its population. It was said that London contained one-ninth part of the population of the whole kingdom. So far was that from being the fact, it would appear from the returns made under the late Population Act, that the population within the walls of the city did not exceed seventy-four thousand persons; and that without the walls it was not more than fifty-four thousand. The number of men therefore, as a part of the army of reserve, to be raised by this bill, was sufficiently great in proportion to what was raised by the rest of the country.

In the house of lords, on the 13th of July, when the woollen manufactory bill was read, the lord chancellor observed, that though he felt many objections to the bill, as it at present stood, he had heard enough from all the gentlemen at the bar, to convince him that, with all its imperfections, there was sufficient principle in it to entitle it to be read a second time, and he hoped their lordships would concur with him in that opinion. His lordship objected to several particulars in the form of the bill, and pointed out a variety of defects; and then, in order to satisfy the petitioners, that the house had acted honestly, honourably, fairly, and faithfully by them, and paid due and serious attention to the objections, moved that it be read a second time.

The earl of Rosslyn said, that the bill was the most ill drawn and unparliamentary of any he had ever read in point of form. It was full of objectionable parts, several of which he stated; he would not, however, oppose its going to a committee.—The bill was therefore committed.

On the 13th of July, when the order of the day on the Income bill was read in the house of commons, Mr. Pitt said, with respect to the provisions of the bill under consideration, there were many of them of which he strongly disapproved. The modes of disposing of capital should not by any means be interfered with, through the operation of a partial tax, tending to encourage the application of that capital to one mode in preference to another. Those modes were various. One wishes to employ his capital in a business which requires great labour, and from which he looks for proportionable profits; another seeks to derive profits from his capital in great risks; and a third chooses to indulge in laziness, and to enjoy a small profit in security. Of the latter, some resort to the funds, and others to land. It struck his mind, that any attempt to meddle by a legislative measure with this, the usual and spontaneous distribution of property, would be highly injudicious and unjust, would be extremely unequal, and tend to violate the very character of an income tax. The great mass of property to be found in this country should be left to find its own level. If taxes are to be levied, they should be accommodated to the present state of property, which should in no case be disturbed. Every man had, to be sure, the right of disposing of his capital as he pleased. But in a country like this, it would be unwise to encourage any man by a partial tax, to give his capital a particular direction; yet such was the tendency of certain clauses in the act before the house, which he hoped would be corrected in the committee. The tax upon income should, according to its principle, be universal, and no man should be suffered to withdraw himself from it, or to escape its operation, but under certain circumstances, not to include the exemption, or unequal taxation, of any particular class of proprietors. It was proposed in the bill to make various abatements to persons having annual revenue not exceeding one hundred and fifty pounds, and all under six hundred pounds a year, to be entirely discharged from the tax. From this exemption, however, the landed proprietors and receivers of interest in the funds to such amount were excluded; he could not, however, conceive the grounds upon which this exclusion rested. No premium should be given to men to employ their capital in a particular way, and nothing could be more iniquitous than to grant such premium of the revenue of the poor land owners occupying their own ground, and the smaller annuitants in the funds. It would be subversive of the system by which this country had prospered, would derange the regular course of property, and depart from that policy by which this country had advanced in defiance of all the pedantry of law, and all the formality of positive institution. Why, he would ask, should persons of humble revenue in the funds and in land be made the sacrifices of this singular difference, while those of superior revenues were left quite untouched? He deprecated in the strongest terms a distinction pregnant with so much injustice in principle, and so much mischief in impression. Mr. Pitt next proceeded to consider the policy of the tax, as now modified, in its operation on Funded Property. He called the attention of the house to the situation of many of those who were to be made liable to the whole tax without any abatements, who had claims to abatement much more powerful than numerous classes of possessors of other property to whom abatements were extended. When it was considered that many of those to be affected by it were the aged and the infirm, altogether incapable of increasing their income by any exertion of their own; when it was reflected that they were in possession of no capital which could admit of any increase; that their wretched pittance could receive no possible augmentation; exposed to the unavoidable vicissitudes which the fluctuation of the funds experienced, and destitute even of the imaginary advantages of hope; was it, he would ask, consistent either with humanity, far less justice, to lay them under a pressure so severe? It was hard that, under these disadvantages, they should be exposed to a fresh burden, which could not fail to add to difficulties already unavoidable. The principle of the bill as it now stood, was in itself unfair, and, at all events, if it were allowed to remain, the same regulation ought to be extended to property in the funds as to all the lower species of property. But, above all other considerations, he deprecated the proposed regulation as inconsistent with the national good faith, and as calculated to strike the first blow against that credit for which the country had been so long distinguished. Never at any period was it more important than at the present moment to preserve the public credit from the slightest suspicion. It would indeed be a most extraordinary and most unaccountable circumstance, if, at the time that we were, for the purpose of upholding the character of the parliament, and maintaining the good faith of the country in paying every year upwards of six millions to the extinction of the national debt, we should, for the sake of gaining a revenue of a few hundred thousand pounds, resort to a tax which might strike at the root of public credit, and materially injure the future resources of the country. After adding a few more observations on this head, the right honourable gentleman sat down by declaring his resolution, as soon as the motion for taking the report into further consideration was disposed of, to move an instruction to the committee in terms of the concluding part of his speech.

would

The principal topics on which both houses of parliament were engaged during the latter part of the month of July, were the bills for the defence of the country, and in consequence of the Irish rebellion. The income tax having been before treated of, and the opinions of the great political characters given on the subject, precludes our going over the same ground of discussion.

On the 22d, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward a bill for the improvement of the port of London, and for the general benefits of merchandize, which was agreed to.

In the committee of ways and means, it appeared that the average increase of permanent taxes from July 1799 to July 1803, amounted to eight hundred and ninety-one thousand, eight hundred and forty-two pounds. Besides this, the chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the following resolutions:

"1. That towards raising the sum of two millions voted in the committee of supply, the sum of one million, five hundred thousand pounds be raised out of the consolidated fund, and be supplied by exchequer bills.

"2. That towards the payment of money advanced by the Bank, the sum of two millions be also raised by loans of exchequer bills, to be made good next year.

"3. That it appears, that the sum of one million, five hundred thousand pounds, stands as the surplus of the consolidated fund."

The attorney general, on July 26th, submitted to the house, the propriety of making some alterations in the laws respecting aliens. It appeared necessary that persons offending under the alien act should be liable to be punished in a more summary manner than was at present provided for. Under the act they could be punished by indictment only for disobeying the king's proclamation, and other offences. This mode of proceeding was, however, frequently very inconvenient; and it would be proposed to alter it. Another change which he intended to suggest, related to the power of sending aliens out of the country; that power was at present possessed by the magistrates; but in his opinion it ought to be lodged in the hands of the crown only. Several regulations, which were not necessary in the time of peace, when the last act was passed, would be introduced; he therefore moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill to repeal the alien act, and to substitute other regulations in lieu thereof. On such considerations, leave was given.

Besides the above, several bills for the regulation, as well as the comforts, of the English and Irish clergy, were passed.

But the most important business which engaged the attention of parliament at this period, was occasioned by the riots in Dublin.

On the 28th, in the house of lords, lord Hobart presented a message from his majesty, relative to the treasonable and rebellious practices lately carried on in Ireland; he said, it was with feelings of the deepest regret, he had to call their lordships' attention to the subject now brought before them. It was with deep and heartfelt sorrow, he reflected on the violent and disgraceful outrages lately committed in Ireland and if there was in those proceedings any one act of atrocity more horrible than another, it was that of the barbarous murder of a most distinguished and meritorious character, who, one would suppose, should have been the last person to fall a sacrifice to the brutal and ferocious spirit with which those miscreants who destroyed him had been actuated. If ever there was a man whose conduct was more blameless than that of another, it was the noble person to whom he alluded. Never was there any man who merited less the resentments of others. In private life, he was peculiarly distinguished for his virtues; and in public, he was eminently useful. He knew the excellent qualities of that noble person: he knew him as a private and public character (o). His lordship observed, that besides the address which he should move to his majesty, the house would probably on that day have occasion to adopt some measures of great importance. He expected that certain bills would be passed in the commons, and sent to that house. One of these would be a bill for enabling the government in Ireland to try persons, charged with (o) As Lord Hobart was proceeding, he was so overcome with grief, that for some moments he could not utter a word; he at length apologized to the house, and trusted their lordships would excuse him for an irregularity which was occasioned by his feelings on a melancholy subject, in which he was so personally interested.

with rebellious practices, by courts martial. In consequence of what had already passed in Ireland, his majesty had power to proclaim martial law there; but if that was done, it would extend universally over the country; but by the measure now intended to be brought forward, the operation of martial law would extend only to persons actually concerned in the rebellion. The next measure would be a suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, by which the lord lieutenant of Ireland would be enabled to detain all persons suspected of treason. These measures it would be necessary to carry into effect without delay. He understood, that besides the outrages committed in the city of Dublin, there had been an insurrection in the county of Kildare. Every noble lord who had heard him must agree, that the most prompt, effectual, and expeditious steps must be taken to put a stop to those disgraceful and horrible proceedings. For the present, he should content himself with moving an humble address to his majesty, thanking him for his most gracious communication; and assuring his majesty, that the house would cheerfully concur in any measures which could tend to restore general tranquillity in Ireland.

The Earl of Limerick spoke at great length on the same subject, and concluded by saying, that on a former occasion, he had observed, that there should be no distinction between the militia of England and the militia of Ireland, and that a small sea should not prevent the militia of one country from passing into another country. If it was proper at that time to adopt his recommendation, how much more so must it be now, for reasons which he would explain to the house. There were about eighteen thousand militia soldiers in Ireland at this time. With regard to the courage and loyalty of those men, he entertained no kind of doubt whatever. But he must assure their lordships, and he spoke from positive knowledge and experience, that every art would be used, as had been used hitherto, to withdraw them from their duty and allegiance: and from the close connexion that existed between them and those people who might be in a state of rebellion—from the superstitious attachment they generally had for each other, and the influence which their priests had over them, it was impossible to say how far their loyalty might be shaken. He must, therefore, again strongly recommend it to his majesty's ministers, to remove the militia regiments from Ireland to Great Britain, not by any compulsory law, but by giving them an opportunity of volunteering their services, and when they came to this country, they would be found as powerful and efficacious troops as any in his majesty's service. He hoped he should be excused for throwing out this hint, but he did it from a real conviction that it would be highly beneficial in the present state of the country.

The address was then moved and passed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, accompanied by several members of the commons, brought up two bills, one for trying rebels by martial law in Ireland, and the other for suspending the Habeas Corpus act in Ireland. They were both read a first time.

On the motion of lord Hobart, the proclamation issued by the lord lieutenant and council of Ireland, on the 24th, was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Hobart then said, that as it would be necessary to pass the two bills on that night, there must be a suspension of the standing orders of the house, which prevented the reading of any bill more than once on the same day. He moved, "That as it was necessary for the public safety these bills should be passed with the utmost dispatch, the house forthwith proceed to read them in their several stages, notwithstanding any standing orders of the house," which being carried, the two bills were read through all their stages, and passed.

It was in the house of commons, however, that the public opinion was more amply displayed concerning the atrocious transaction alluded to.

The same day on which this business had been brought forward in the house of lords, the chancellor of the exchequer presented to the lower house, the following message from his majesty:

"GEORGE R.

"His majesty feels the deepest regret in acquainting the house of commons, that a treasonable and rebellious spirit of insurrection has manifested itself in Ireland, which has been marked by circumstances of peculiar atrocity in the city of Dublin.

"His majesty relies with perfect confidence on the wisdom of his parliament, that such measures will be forthwith adopted, as are best calculated to afford protection and security to his majesty's loyal subjects in that part of the united kingdom, and to restore and preserve general tranquillity. "G. R."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after expatiating on the enormity of the Irish rebellion, proposed, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, to return his majesty the thanks of this house for his most gracious message; to assure his majesty, that we learn with the strongest feelings of regret and indignation, that a treasonable and rebellious spirit of insurrection has manifested itself in Ireland, which has been marked with circumstances of peculiar atrocity in the city of Dublin; that his majesty may be assured of the readiness and determination of his faithful commons, to adopt forthwith such measures as may appear to them to be best calculated to afford protection and security to his majesty's loyal subjects in that part of the united kingdom, and to restore and preserve general tranquillity."

Mr. Windham said, the proposing of an address to the throne upon the very same day on which his majesty's message had been delivered, was exceedingly unusual in parliamentary proceedings. He thought it might be reckoned respectful to the crown, to make a small interval of time betwixt his majesty's message and the address now proposed. The objects comprehended by that message were not at present fit for mature consideration. If the bare statement of measures were enough, then it would be thought unbecoming in parliament ever to enter into any minute consideration of a message, previous to its adopting an answer to be returned to his majesty. Now, upon this particular subject, he could really conceive, that there was a great deal of information and mature deliberation wanted, before they could frame an address which could be reckoned proper for the occasion. Was it an easy matter to say, that Ireland had been surprized by an open rebellion or insurrection having broken out, that government had been so ignorant of their dangers, that even the capital of that part of the united kingdom had been almost wrested from them by means of that rebellion? Were not those points on which the house would wish to be informed, before they thought of adopting any final answer to such a communication? How came it to pass, that the capital of that part of the united kingdom was within an ace of being taken, and the government overturned? It appeared from all these circumstances, that the government of the country might be snatched away, without the least notice being previously given to the house, as to the real existing dangers. That being the state of things, it required the greatest consideration of parliament to know what ought to be done. The delay of even twenty-four hours had been objected to in the present instance. Nor could he determine whether the urgency of the case could be so great as to preclude the urgency of consideration. He concluded by saying, that if the address was at present to be agreed to, it should in his opinion be done only pro forma, and then the matter taken into consideration and deliberate discussion; it being a practice not countenanced by the general rules of the house, to vote an immediate address to any message from his majesty.

After a few observations by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Hutchinson, Lord Hawkesbury, Dr. Lawrence, Lord Castlereagh, and Mr. Alexander, the question was put, and the address voted nem. con.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then brought up a copy of the proclamation of the lord lieutenant and council of Ireland, which we have noticed before.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then said, that the house would observe, in the proclamation, that it stated, the outrage committed in Dublin was, in the opinion of the persons by whom the proclamation was issued, the result of a dangerous and traitorous conspiracy against his majesty's government and the constitution of the country. He was fully aware that he should not be justified, nor could any consideration induce him to propose such measures as those which he felt it his duty, indispensable duty, to submit, if the outrages which had excited the horror and indignation of every well conditioned mind, were the result of any other projects than those against the public safety: for however they might regret the circumstances alluded to in the proclamation, they furnished of themselves no ground for narrowing the constitution within the limits of the existing government of the country; and although the proclamation avowed a dangerous conspiracy, it did not specify those details which it was necessary should be furnished before those measures were adopted which he should feel it his duty to recommend. He should contend that the proclamation itself contained grounds which would warrant the measure, but it was necessary he should state that the proclamation did not contain all the information in possession of his majesty's government; information which, at the present moment, it would have been highly improper to declare. It stated a dangerous conspiracy at a time when it was the avowed design of the enemy to invade the country, and when the parliament was about to separate. With respect to the particular measure he meant first to propose, and he assured the house, he did it with reluctance, it was for the purpose, according to the title of the bill, of suppressing rebellion, and protecting the persons and property of his majesty's faithful subjects in Ireland. The means by which this purpose was to be effected were, that wherever persons should be found in actual rebellion, power should be given to the lord lieutenant to direct that courts martial should be called for their immediate trial. Martial law being proclaimed in any place, suspended the ordinary course of justice, and substituted martial law for the law of the land. He wished to give a power to the lord lieutenant, that should not disturb the ordinary administration of justice, but by which, for the purpose of suppressing rebellion, those who were taken in arms against the government should be liable to be tried by a military court. If the house should adopt the motion for the bill he had stated, he should follow it up with a motion for the suspension of the habeas corpus act. The bill he meant to propose was meant to qualify the rigour of the other bill, by providing that persons might be committed by civil process, without any court martial. He then moved for leave to bring in a bill, for the suppression of rebellion in Ireland, and for the protection of the persons and property of his majesty's faithful subjects there.

of

Mr. Windham said, he wished to suggest the real situation in which the house was placed. Whether the measure was right or wrong, he should not attempt to pronounce. He must take it on the representation and knowledge of his majesty's ministers, who themselves had taken it from the representation and knowledge of others. He thought it a measure too strong to be taken on the authority of such information. As the question stood, martial law was to be established in Ireland, because the right honourable gentleman, for reasons which he could not declare, told the house it was necessary. It was a circumstance worthy of reflection, that the persons on whose authority they were to rely for the necessity of the measure proposed, were the very ministers by whom the last acts had been repealed. It was very remarkable, that they who, at no very distant period, repealed the acts, should now desire the house to renew them. When the house was not allowed a moment to deliberate, it naturally created doubt.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in explanation, stated, that the government of Ireland had not repealed the acts after the peace, but had suffered them to expire.

Mr. Hawthorn supported the motion, because he thought the measure would be productive of most salutary effects in the hands of that illustrious nobleman now at the head of the government in Ireland; and he was of opinion, that, notwithstanding the partial instance of insurrection and outrage which had recently occurred, that spirit was by no means general in Ireland, and so far as it did exist, was confined to the lowest orders of the people.

After a few reflexions on the nature of the subject by Mr. I. H. Browne, Mr. Hutchinson, and Lord Castlereagh, the report of the bill was received and passed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to secure and detain such persons as he should suspect to be conspiring against his majesty's person and government. The bill was brought up, carried through all its stages, and passed. A clause was introduced into this, as well as into the former bill, for limiting the duration of both to six weeks after the commencement of the next session of parliament. The bills were sent to the lords, and about half past ten o'clock, a message came down, informing the house, that the lords had agreed to the same without any amendment.

We must now advert to the affairs of the continent, in which we must notice the towering ambition of the First Consul, who, having burst through every boundary, set all human investigation at defiance. The absolute controul which he had assumed, the violence which he menaced, and the promises which he liberally dispersed, hinted to every nation, that on his will depended prosperity or adversity.

Enveloped by a concatenation of circumstances which nourished his vanity, and added strength to his measures, the operation of these evinced itself in a very conspicuous, immediate, and unexpected manner. Bonaparte, though nominally united in office, could not brook equals, and therefore panted for superiority. It was not the chief consulate that was to gratify his wishes; the royal tarnished diadem of France, he imagined, was to recover more than its former lustre, when ornamenting his brows; but this, without the absolute authority, consequence, and inviolability attached, were not charms sufficient for his attention; and therefore he had privately negociated with the Bourbon princes to relinquish their right in his favour, and offered them terms for their resignation, which they of course rejected.

The first consul having been declared the head of the army of England, appointed general Berthier to be chief, and Desolles, second in command, and named a number of subordinate officers. The labours in the dock yards assumed a state of exertion: all France, Holland, and Flanders, were employed to furnish warlike implements for the proposed invasion of England; and no pains were wanting to evince the most extraordinary activity to forward the chief consul's boasted project.

By way of encouraging the people of Paris, to an approbation of these proceedings, the journalists were instructed to deceive the people by fabricated assertions of internal disturbances against the government in England; and to accord with these measures, emissaries were sent to the different European powers, for the purpose of inducing them to form an armed neutrality against the British government. Electors were to govern kingdoms; and kings were to be exalted to emperors. Malta was offered to the emperor of Russia: Hanover was promised to his brother-in-law the duke of Mechlenburgh, whilst the dominions of his other brother-in-law, the elector of Bavaria, were to be raised to a kingdom. Russia, however, refused the gaudy boon, and Prussia was the next object for application. To this monarch was promised Hanover, the Imperial city of Bremen, and the ostentatious glittering of an imperial crown. Hamburgh and Lubeck were proposed to Denmark, in return for the island of Bornholm, as ceded to Sweden, in exchange for Swedish Pomerania, which had been already given to the prince bishop of Lubeck.

Such was the plan for revolutionizing the north of Europe. The French minister, Talleyrand, had said, "that not a prince should survive upon the continent, whose existence was not dependent on that of his master; who had not shared his indemnities, or who had not guaranteed the indemnities, as he had thought fit to share them among the several states." This had been fully exemplified in the destruction of Venice, the partition of Germany, the slavery of Switzerland, the invasion of Egypt, and the oppression of Holland.

Such was the unhappy state of the continent of Europe at this period, which we leave for the present, and return to that part of the British history which lately engaged our attention.

The effects produced by the riots in Dublin, were jealousy and apprehension; and although government pursued the most vigorous measures for quieting the alarm which such an outrage had occasioned, still each looked upon his neighbour with suspicion, and feared to trust him with his sentiments upon the dangers that seemed to hover round the capital and its vicinity. This disposition was increased by the discovery of vast quantities of arms in several parts of the city, by the yeomanry and military, which were conveyed to the castle and barracks. But when the spirit of rebellion was exposed and repelled by the prompt measures of government, public confidence assumed its importance. The insurgents were hunted out of their retreats, and brought forward to atone for their enormities.

To add strength and authority to these proceedings, the efforts of the magistracy were rendered efficient, by a proclamation issued by the lord lieutenant, in which was inserted, that "Whereas it had become necessary to use the most speedy and effectual means to put an end to the rebellious insurrections which had broken out, and had been attended with the most daring and flagrant outrages: the lord lieutenant had thought fit, by and with the advice of his majesty's privy council, to give orders, and they had accordingly given the most positive orders to the officers commanding his majesty's forces, to exert the utmost energy for that purpose, and therefore to attack and disperse all assemblies of armed rebels, wherever they might be found, and to do military execution upon all such rebels as they should find in arms."

lord

The government, at the same time, issued another proclamation, offering a reward of five hundred pounds for the discovery of the murderers of lieutenant-colonel Browne; and three hundred pounds for the apprehension of the murderers of cornet Cole, of the 12th dragoons, who had been killed at the same time.

The consequence of these proceedings was, that apprehensions of delinquents took place in every quarter, and several persons of respectability were called upon to answer for their conduct.

The Roman Catholic clergy also felt themselves impelled to use the best endeavours in their power to restore tranquillity. A principle of subordination also induced the catholic archbishop of Dublin, to circulate a pastoral address among his clergy, which they were instructed to publish in their several places of worship, and at the same time to exhort their congregations to the preservation of peace. Thus the vigour now exerted, and the precautions taken to maintain and ensure the public tranquillity, promised a hope of future peace and good order.

That a regular plan of rebellion existed, and had been organized in Ireland, there is, great reason to believe; and that the outrages in Dublin were intended to form the prelude to a general rising throughout the country, authorizes more than mere supposition. This opinion is confirmed by the fact of some of the rebel chiefs, who stiled themselves "The Provisional Government of the People of Ireland," issuing a proclamation, copies of which came into the hands of government, containing a developement of their object and views. This proclamation set out with stating, that the system of insurrection had been organized for the last eight months, that it was totally independent of any prospect of foreign assistance; that the failure of a similar attempt in England had not retarded, nor the renewal of hostilities accelerated its progress. The developement of this system, it was stated, would shew to the people of this country, that the spirit of perseverance in Ireland could by no human efforts be repressed, that under no change of circumstances could the obedience of the Irish be relied on, that those engaged in the insurrection would be satisfied with nothing short of complete absolute separation. They considered themselves pledged to trust to their own strength only, and that the first attempt to introduce what they denominated a SYSTEM OF TERROR should be the signal of insurrection. They declared their object to be, "TO ESTABLISH A FREE AND INDEPENDENT REPUBLIC IN IRELAND; that the pursuit of this object they would relinquish only with their lives; that they would never, unless at the express call of their country, abandon their post, until the acknowledgement of its independence was obtained from England; and that they would enter into no negociation (but for exchange of prisoners) with the government of that country, while a British army remains in Ireland."

This general declaration being made, they proceeded to address themselves to the inhabitants of the different provinces. They first appealed to the North, and exhorted them by their past exertions, to come forward with spirit and unanimity at the present crisis. There appeared a great affectation of humanity and abhorrence of outrage in their language to the inhabitants of Leinster. They cautioned them against excesses of all kinds, and impressed on them that if six years ago, when they rose without arms, without plan, without co-operation, with more troops against them alone than are now in the country at large, they were able to remain for six weeks in open defiance of the government, and within a few miles of the capital, what would they not now effect with that capital, and every other part of Ireland ready to support them? They were at great pains to disclaim the idea of this being a religious contest. Religious disqualification they declared to be only one of the many grievances of which Ireland had to complain. Their intention was to remove not only that, but every oppression under which they laboured. They represented themselves as fighting for their country, and that done, every man was to have his religion. After finishing their appeal to those whom they considered their tried adherents, they next turned to that portion of their countrymen whose prejudices they would rather overcome by a frank declaration of their intention, than conquer their persons in the field.

In this appeal, there is a very artful affectation of moderation and forbearance. It then proceeds,

"We will therefore enter into no detail of the atrocities and oppression which Ireland has laboured under during its connection with England, but we justify our determination to separate from that country on the broad historical statement, that during six hundred years she has been unable to conciliate the affections of the people of Ireland; that during that time five rebellions were entered into to shake off the yoke; that she has been obliged to resort to a system of unprecedented torture in her defence; that she has broken every tie of voluntary connection by taking even the name of independence from Ireland, through the intervention of a parliament notoriously bribed, and not representing the will of the people; that in her vindication of this measure, she has herself given the justification of the views of the United Irishmen, by declaring in the words of her ministers—That Ireland never had, and never could enjoy under the then circumstances, the benefits of British connection; that it necessarily must happen when one country is connected with another, that the interests of the lesser will be borne down by those of the greater; that England had supported and encouraged the English colonists in their oppression towards the natives of Ireland; that Ireland had been left in a state of ignorance, rudeness, and barbarism, worse in its effects, and more degrading in its nature, than that on which it was found six centuries before. They, therefore, warred not against property or any religious sect, not against past opinions and prejudices, but against English dominion." The conclusion of the proclamation was addressed to the established government. They endeavoured to paint the consequences of a system of terror in increasing their success. They held out threats of dreadful retaliation in case a single rebel was put to death, unless on the field of battle. Their language on this subject, held out, that—"The prisoners which first fall into our hands shall be treated with the respect due to the unfortunate; but if the life of a single Irish soldier is taken after the battle is over, the orders thenceforth to be issued to the Irish army are—neither to give or take quarter. Countrymen, if a cruel necessity forces us to retaliate, we will bury our resentments in the field of battle."

Whatever might have been the success of such resolutions; and how far their professions might have been realized, had the projectors accomplished their purpose, we cannot take upon us to affirm; but the promptitude of the lord lieutenant, and the Irish government, was evinced by the most decisive measures. On the 30th of July, 1803, general orders from the adjutant-general's office in Dublin, made its appearance. It expressed, that "the commander of the forces had it in command from his excellency the lord lieutenant, to express to the regular forces, militia and yeomanry, composing the garrison of Dublin, his excellency's warmest approbation of the zeal, alacrity, and spirit which they displayed in suppressing the rebellious insurrection which manifested itself in the city on the evening of the 23d instant. The Royal Scotch Fuzileers, and the Liberty Rangers, who were chiefly employed, would be pleased to receive his excellency's particular thanks. His excellency had directed the commander of the forces, at the same time, to observe to the officers in command of regiments of the line and militia, and yeomanry corps, that the nature of the duties which they may still be called on to perform, particularly required that the strictest discipline should be observed by the men under their command; and desired that on all occasions, the most positive orders might be given for the security of the property and persons of individuals against plunder and outrage, as far as circumstances might permit; and that every effort should be used to prevent any act of severity or violence being committed, beyond what the faithful discharge of their military duty should render indispensible."

Thus the powers vested by the adoption of martial law, were so exercised, as to shew a desire in the government, though the most absolute authority was in their option, to choose the milder mode of confining such controul within narrow bounds, that civil justice might not be interrupted, except where individual property was invaded.

Certain resolutions which were passed in the imperial parliament having arrived in Ireland, the lord lieutenant issued issued a proclamation for suspending the Habeas Corpus act, and to forbid the sailing of any person from Ireland to England without a proper passport.

Whilst the government and magistracy were exerting themselves to suppress rebellion, and restore tranquillity, the patriotic part of the country were strenuous in their endeavours for the general welfare of the united kingdom, against the machinations of its enemies; and in various parts of the country a return to loyalty and duty evinced itself.

On the 3d of this month, a calamitous event happened in Dublin. About two o'clock in the afternoon, a most dreadful hurricane occurred, accompanied with thunder and lightning, which, though it lasted not more than ten minutes, produced the most dreadful consequences. Several chimnies were blown down, some houses unroofed, and a whole range of stables in Merrion Row levelled with the ground. The Beresford Packet of Parkgate, unfortunately at this time was endeavouring to clear the harbour; the captain had prolonged his departure to the last minute, in hopes of getting additional passengers, and the tide having been long on the ebb, there was not water sufficient to carry her over the bar, on which she was driven by the violence of the storm. In this state she soon filled, and the whole of the steerage passengers, amounting to fifty-five, met a watery grave; the cabin passengers were more fortunate, being able to cling to the masts and rigging, until the boats from Bullock and Dunleary came to their assistance.

Several persons were arrested for treasonable practices about this period, among whom was Mr. Robert Emmett, younger brother to a celebrated counsellor; he had been for some time concealed in the house of a person named Palmer, whose brother was in custody upon a charge of having a concealed gun-powder manufactory, which had been discovered previously to the late outrage. On being identified, Mr. Emmett was committed to the Tower in the Castle, to abide the decision of law.

A special commission was issued for the trial of those charged with rebellion; and on the 24th of August, the honourable Judge Downes, Judge Finucane, and Mr. Baron Daly, having opened the court, the commission was read, which besides the above-mentioned judges, included lord Norbury and baron George.—Two respectable grand juries were constituted for the city and county.

The honourable judge Downes, in his address to the jury, observed, that they were called upon to execute the grand inquisition which was to precede the more public and final enquiry between his majesty and the prisoners to be tried under the present commission, and to determine from the bills of indictment laid before them, whether sufficient grounds existed for sending the accused to trial. On the general nature of their duties it was unnecessary to expatiate, as the gentlemen composing the juries had most or all of them exercised those duties before in the same place, and were accustomed to see the judges of the land administer the law of the land under the same authority by which the court then addressed them. They were called upon to act as grand jurors in unusual times. The offences which would form the object of their enquiry would not be merely of a general and common nature, but of a description the most heinous in the eye of the law, as being of the most destructive consequence to the whole frame of society. The public peace had been violently broken, attended with such barbarous atrocities, such savage aggravations of guilt, as scarcely to find a parallel in the records of human crime. This induced his majesty's government to lose no time to make them the subject of judicial enquiry and legal punishment. From the aspect of the informations, his lordship had no doubt but that the indictments would contain charges of high treason—a crime unknown in this country before the rebellion of 1798. The exertions, however, of his majesty's government, aided by the loyalty of the land, crushed the attempt, and having done so, that government tried by clemency, as well as firmness, to bring back an erring and offending multitude to their duty and to happiness. An act of general pardon was passed, which might naturally have been expected to produce the best influence on a deluded people; but unhappily it would still appear, that there existed wicked and designing men, exciting a furious multitude to outrages which would be found to constitute some of the charges against many of the prisoners to be tried during the present commission. His lordship next proceeded to make some observations explanatory of the laws against high treason, but without adverting to any particular case. He then, after paying a general tribute to the brave and loyal men who were basely assassinated on the 23rd of July, adverted to the murder of lord Kilwarden; and then said, this was a moment in which every loyal, virtuous man should lend his hand to the state, and support it by all the means in his power, and the gentlemen whom he addressed, should not relax in their efforts for the public security, and the maintenance of the laws; their lives and liberties were at stake; the first and dearest interests of every man, however humble, were involved, and the vigilance of the magistracy, and the generous loyalty and patriotism of all, should be commensurate to the invaluable rights and social blessings which a free, great, and happy people have to watch over and defend."

The honourable judge having concluded his charge, bills of indictment were sent up to the grand juries, and true bills were found against sixteen of the offenders, who had counsel assigned them, and every indulgence granted, which the laws of their country could allow.

The only occurrence worthy of notice in the naval department of this period, was the behaviour of the captain and crew of the Catharine and Mary privateer of London. This vessel mounting ten four-pounders, had been on a cruise; and having had two severe actions with the Caroline French brig privateer, of twenty-two long six pounders, and ninety men, to which, after the most gallant defence, and after having expended every thing that could be converted into ammunition, she was compelled to strike. She fell in with the Caroline on the evening of the 23d ult. with the Sybill, an English South Whaler, and the Active West Indiaman, in company, which she had captured. Notwithstanding her great superiority, captain Goodall of the English privateer immediately attacked her, and after a severe contest, the Frenchman sheered off. In the course of the night, captain Goodall recaptured the two English ships, but the Frenchman conceiving that the English crew had been weakened, renewed the attack with redoubled vigour, and continued it until the Catherine and Mary had not the power of discharging another gun, when, to prevent further slaughter, she was obliged to strike. During the engagement, one man was killed and nine wounded, two of them mortally, and the vessel was much cut in her masts, sails, rigging, and hull (p). The two recaptured vessels again fell into the hands of the French, after the capture of the Catherine and Mary, and they shaped their course for France. The Caroline had five English captains on board, taken out of ships she had captured. The conduct of captain Goodall and his crew, on this occasion, was highly meritorious.

Two small British cruizers, one the Basilisk gun-brig, commanded by captain Shepheard, and his majesty's armed cutter Princess Augusta, being at anchor close off Boulogne, in a calm on the 9th of August, were attacked by seven of the enemy's gun boats filled with soldiers, who began a heavy cannonade, which was returned with interest by the two vessels. Finding themselves so roughly treated, the gun boats retreated under the batteries, within shore. Captain Shepheard then made a signal to captain M'Leod, of his majesty's bomb Sulphur, who then appeared in sight, when this little squadron renewed the attack, and compelled the French flotilla to retreat to the pier-head.

The parliamentary business drawing to a conclusion, it could not be expected that much important matter could come before the different houses; but what engaged their attention, was of too much consequence to remain unnoticed.

The house of commons, on the 2d of August, were employed in discussing the merits of the India budget; on this occasion, Mr. Princep stated, "that if the company persevered in paying their debts in the present circuitous manner, the consequences could not fail to be, in the end, very ruinous and fatal to their best interests, and must inevitably and totally preclude any expectation the house or country might have formed, of receiving any of that participation in the resources of the company, which had been so long and so repeatedly promised them. It had been stated, that the debt of the India company was ten millions; whereas on comparison of all the papers, and a minute investigation of all the sums taken from the papers produced by that right honourable gentleman, the amount was fifteen millions sterling, which sum had been taken out of the revenues of the company, by means of loans, and other improper methods of managing the company's finances. Had that sum been applied in payment of the debt, it might have been altogether extinguished in the course of five years, and in that case, instead of the present existing debt of nineteen millions, the company would be in possession of three millions, with a debt of no more than two millions. He therefore thought himself strictly warranted in repeating, that if the system be pursued, of paying off the debt in the same circuitous way that had hitherto been persisted in, the consequence would not fail to be highly injurious, and, he feared, would in the end prove fatal and ruinous to their interests. Bills to the amount of five hundred thousand pounds had been drawn, and the expences of various kinds had amounted to full as much more; whereas, had the trade been limited according to the act of parliament passed for that purpose, no India debt would exist."

(p) After the Frenchman boarded her, they cut away her main-mast, threw all her guns overboard, together with every other moveable store, quadrant, compasses, &c. except just enough to bring her to port; and after having taken captain Goodall and the mate out of her, they turned her adrift.

Mr. Sheridan made his motion relative to the volunteers, and said that his motion would include volunteer corps, corps of yeomanry, and corps which were raised by patriotic gentlemen, and accepted by government. He observed, that in addition to a regular army of a certain magnitude, a force, consisting of militia, volunteers, and yeomanry, was a force more suited to the habits, to the circumstances, to the constitutional liberties of this country. In saying this, he did not speak of an army for the purpose of carrying on a continental war, but a force such as it behoved us to keep up when the necessity of cultivating military habits was more imperiously imposed on us by the ambition and malignity of a foreign enemy, whom nothing could satisfy short of our destruction. Great standing armies, however disciplined and powerful, were not to be implicitly trusted; but he admired the present constitution of our military force, as being exempted from the inconveniencies and the evils which attached in a certain degree to all standing, exclusive, permanent armies. By such a constitution, the strength and efficiency of the whole was confirmed and consolidated. Mr. Sheridan, in conclusion, said, that the zeal, the fortitude, the promptitude, with which the volunteer associations had obeyed the call of their country in the hour of her danger, could never be sufficiently admired. He then moved, "That the thanks of this house be given to the volunteer and yeomanry corps, for the zeal and promptitude with which they associated for the defence of the country, in this important and dangerous crisis."

Mr. Sheridan's motion was seconded by general Gascoigne; and after a debate of seven hours, including the remarks of Mr. Windham, colonel Craufurd, and other members in opposition, Mr. Sheridan's reply silenced every objection, and the motion passed nem. con.

Mr. Sheridan next moved that the Speaker do signify to the lords lieutenants of counties, &c. the assent of the house to the above resolution. Agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Sheridan finally moved, "That a return be made and entered upon the journals, of the names and number of the volunteer corps, who, from the present moment till the next meeting of parliament, should enrol themselves and be accepted by his majesty, in order that their patriotic example may be handed down to animate our latest posterity." This motion was also agreed to nem. con.

On the 11th, the house was occupied concerning Mr. Hutchinson's motion relative to the affairs of Ireland. He began by observing how material it was in the present juncture, to enable his majesty to avail himself of all the resources which every part of the empire was capable of affording, and how desirable it therefore was to put Ireland in such a situation as to render her natural strength, her wealth, and her population, available for the common safety of the empire. The unanimity which appeared in this country was a source of gladness to every loyal mind, but the joy of an Irishman was considerably allayed by the reflection that so many of his countrymen were, by the oppression they endured, by the wretched poverty they suffered, damped in their ardour for the public security, if not altogether alienated in their affections for the British government. To remedy this misfortune, he called upon ministers to attend to the state of Ireland, and to reform the system by which it had been so long governed, which would serve to establish the tranquillity of Ireland, and to place that country beyond the reach of foreign aggression and domestic treason. He called upon the liberality of parliament to consider this subject, and upon the equity of ministers to recollect the solemn pledges which had been made to the Irish at the time of that union which deprived Ireland of its parliament. He demanded of them the execution of those promises, if they wished that the professions of the British cabinet should have any confidence or credit in the sister country. For himself, he would confess, that when that measure was carried he did not reckon much on the splendid prospects which he understood were held out by the emissaries of the British cabinet to delude the supporters of that measure, and from that and still stronger reasons he opposed it, but as it had actually taken place, it was his wish that this incorporation should be the parent of settlement, and not the nurse of revolution. He begged it to be understood, that it was not his intention to charge any set of men with a designed breach of promise, but he regretted that his countrymen were deceived, that ministers were so inattentive to their wants and desires. This was a conduct which any Irishman must observe with pain, as tending to produce the most dreadful calamity to Ireland, and threatening to involve the downfal of the empire. He then entered into a comparison between the systems in which the government of the two countries was managed, and contended that they were essentially different—the people of England enjoying the privileges of the constitution, and the advantages and profits of industry, to both of which the people of Ireland were almost entire strangers; for the revolution of 1688, which gave liberty to the former, cramped the industry of the latter, and laid the foundation of the discords which had since desolated that unhappy country. So long as any part of this system was suffered to exist, he was fully persuaded that it would be idle to calculate on the peace of Ireland, or to look for harmony or happiness among that people. If any doubt was entertained of the melancholy situation of Ireland, or that the picture was exaggerated, he desired that a deputation be appointed by the house to go over to that country, to investigate the state of the poor, and to report their opinion to parliament after the recess. If such a course were adopted, he was confident, from what he observed of the liberality of the house, that relief would be granted to his poor countrymen. The office of deputy on such occasion, would be one of the highest honour, and one which no doubt any man of humanity would be happy to undertake. This was one of the means to which ministers ought to resort, to put parliament in possession of the authentic information respecting a country in which, by justice solely, it was in the power of ministers to recover the minds of the disaffected, and to substitute the most zealous loyalty for hostility and desperation. If the just expectations, said he, of the people of Ireland should be satisfied, and they should be cordially attached to the British government, there was very little doubt that we should be qualified to despise the menaces of that insatiable despot, by whose machinations alone the horrible atrocity lately committed in Dublin was to be attributed; that to which no Irishman could advert without horror and indignation; but he trusted that the benevolent interposition of the house would cure them of their disaffection; that interposition which humanity and policy should urge the government to make, in order to protect from bloodshed a body of men who had the strongest claims to their kindness—who were their fellow subjects for now above six hundred years—who had fought their battles—who had contributed to establish their strength and consequence, and who were still capable of assisting in the defence of that strength and consequence, if they were only treated with equity, and the natural resources of the country were properly nurtured. These advantages, which it possessed from nature, were generally known, and the character of its inhabitants was esteemed wherever it was known; for, of whatever enormities some of its infatuated people might have been guilty in times of civil commotion—enormities which were equalled, if not exceeded, under similar circumstances in other countries, and very recently in this. It could not, he said, be pretended by ministers that they did not possess the power of granting a complete redress of grievances to Ireland. It might be said, that ministers had in contemplation to bring forward a better system for Ireland, but that it was not yet prepared. The case, however, did not admit of delay. If any commotion should take place in Ireland during the recess, which was not improbable, he recom-recommended government to meet it with vigour, but exhorted them, at the same time, to send positive orders that no cruelty should be practised, that vigour should be blended with humanity; that such measures as the loyalists resorted to during the rebellion of 1798, and which too many of them were disposed to employ at present, shall not be allowed, for he assured ministers that they would only tend to create thousands of rebels; which would drive many to desperation who were at present tranquil. His advice, therefore, upon this point, he hoped, would be followed by ministers, from that humanity which formed the most prominent trait in the character of the present minister. He expected that he would not tolerate any wanton severity, the apprehension of which was now such in Ireland, that he knew of many families who were anxious to quit the country, in order to release themselves from seeing or suffering such dreadful scenes as were too frequent during the former rebellion; but he hoped they would never again occur, that the outrages of the rebel and the loyalist would be repressed, and that we should hear no more of house-burning, of pillage, or of tortures! He concluded with moving, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying he will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before the house, such information as has been received respecting the late rebellious outrages in Ireland, and the present state of that part of the united kingdom."

Mr. Hutchinson's motion was replied to by lord Hawkesbury, and was productive of a very serious and energetic debate, but it was negatived without a division.

The next day, at three o'clock, his majesty went to the house of lords, where the peers being assembled, and his majesty being seated on the throne, a message was sent to desire the attendance of the house of commons, when the Speaker, accompanied by several members, approached the bar of the house of lords, and addressed his majesty in an energetic speech, which he concluded by saying, "To the bills which I have now humbly to present to your majesty, your commons, with all humility, entreat your majesty's royal assent."

His majesty then made a speech from the throne, and the parliament was prorogued to Thursday, the 6th day of October. Thus closed the first, and very important session of the new imperial parliament.

In the affairs of France, we must observe, that Bonaparte evinced in all his actions, that he had studied the character of the French nation, and that the portrait which their own countryman Montaigne drew of them was not overcharged (q). His creatures that looked up to him for bread, found that his ear was always open to flattery, and they lavished it on every side. Even the men of letters, forgetful of that dignity and independence of mind which learning ought to inspire, were among the first to sound his praise: he was compared by one to Alexander, by another to Cæsar, and by a third to Scipio. The only persons who appear at this period to have given the chief consul uneasiness, were general Moreau and the Abbé Sieyes. He well knew that it was not easy to blast the laurels that the former had reaped in the tented field, and that his military fame was heightened by those amiable qualities which always accompany real valour, and distinguish the true soldier from the barbarian. He had nothing to dread from the Abbé, but his cunning, and the pliability of his politics.

Bonaparte saw that it was impossible to accomplish the ambitious views which he appears to have cherished, so long as the freedom of speech, and the liberty of the press remained; and in order to suppress them both, he resorted to power: a swarm of spies were let loose upon the public; and the press, that great medium through which we "think aloud," as Addison expresses it, was so completely shackled, that it was converted into a mere state engine, calculated to promote the ends of those who trampled on the ruins of their country.

The first consul likewise conceived it necessary to visit the coast, that he might learn to what degree of popularity his fame had ascended; to see the country, and above all, perhaps, to give a consistency and colour to the promise he had made, that he would invade England with fire and sword: but that he intended to invade this country is much doubted. Bonaparte, therefore, paid a visit to Calais, where he arrived on the 20th of October, 1803. The entrance of the "greatest man in the world," as the French papers stiled him, was announced by a discharge of cannon; the town hall was decorated with boughs of trees; the windows and carriages newly painted, and a range of flags of all nations displayed from the balcony over the entrance; the market-place was strewed with fine sand, and all the principal streets decorated with rows of artificial trees; the gates of the town were also ornamented with wreaths of flowers; an inscription was hung up in the street leading to the port, "The Liberty of the Seas," and another in large characters was affixed on the gate which opens to the passage for embarkation, "The Road to London." Some of the young men of the town came forward as a guard of honour to attend him in all his movements. The following in letters of gold was inscribed on their flag:

"BONAPARTE,
Amidst the descendants of
EUSTACE ST. PIERRE,
12th of Messidor, year 11."

Bonaparte was so well pleased with his reception, that on his return to Paris, he ordered a letter to be addressed to the inhabitants of Calais, in which he assured them, "no request they could make, would ever be denied them."

The dread, however, of an invasion, raised the spirit of the people of England, and the volunteer system acquired daily strength, pervading the most distant corners of England. Government saw the necessity of moulding this body into form, so as to derive the best advantages from their number, force, and spirit.

Several public companies also and corporate bodies gave at the same time instances of their zeal. The Birmingham Canal Company subscribed five hundred pounds at one meeting: the inhabitants of Manchester, in the course of a few days raised a subscription of twenty thousand pounds. The example was followed in many parts of the kingdom. All party spirit was lost in one grand consideration, the DEFENCE OF THE NATION, in case of a French invasion.

It was apprehended in England, that the powers on the continent, would be roused at the temerity of Bonaparte, that it would be their interest to unite in reducing France to its ancient bounds, and by that means restore what is called the balance of power: but instead of shewing any hostile disposition towards the first consul, they publicly avowed their intention of observing the strictest neutrality. The emperor of Germany published an ordonance to this effect, in which he forbade any of his subjects to enter into the service of France or England, by land or sea. This edict consisted of twenty-one articles, in which the admission of prizes into the Imperial harbours, and the manner in which they were to be disposed of were regulated. The emperor of Russia was employed in the internal regulation of his immense empire; agriculture, manufactures, the useful arts, and those that embellish human life, successively engaged his attention.

That system of polity which had influenced the cabinets of Europe from the days of Charlemagne, down to the present, now seemed to yield to another of a very different complexion. Ambition, gratified by splendid victories, was the soul of the first, and interest appeared to be that of the second. It was the policy of Bonaparte to hasten the dissolution of the old system, and to bring the other forward as fast as possible. With this view he paid every court to the king of Prussia, and probably held out plans of territorial aggrandizement to that monarch.

We have mentioned above the opening of the commission for trying the rebels in Ireland, and we have now to record, that in the month of September, 1803, several persons concerned in the murder of lord Kilwarden, were indicted for high treason, and brought to trial. The first on this list was Edward Kearney. The Attorney General on this occasion addressed the jury in a speech of some length, in which he lamented, "that too many grow hardened by the contemplation of their wicked projects; and, insensible to the miseries they were inflicting on others, had contributed to place the prisoner at the bar in that situation, against which he should have been guarded by their character; men of depraved minds, and desperate fortunes,

(q) The French scarcely see a new object but they will it. The wish almost instantaneously follows the perception, and as they seize with greediness, they let go with equal haste. The cameleon does not change its colour with readier obedience to the objects which surround it, than they do their inclinations. They determine solemnly this moment, the next they have already changed their mind, and in one moment more come round again to the first thought. Their will is perpetual vibrations, and every day has its own whim. Essais de Montaigne, liv. i. chap. iv. 18.

fortunes, giddy in the contemplation of the same schemes of avarice and ambition, and assuring their wretched victims of impracticable good, while they were implicating them in the certain evils of confiscation and civil war." The prisoner was found guilty and executed with several others.

The British cabinet now judged it expedient to establish a rigorous blockade at the entrance of Havre de Grace, and the other ports of the Seine, according to the usages of war established and allowed in similar cases. His majesty at the same time caused it to be notified to the ministers of the neutral powers, that the navigation thereof was to be considered as being in a state of blockade.

The chief consul, to evince the virulence by which he was guided, resorted to every measure in his power to harrass the trade of this country; but notwithstanding his efforts to cripple our commerce, the excellence of our manufactures, the probity of our merchants, and the long credit which they were in the habit of giving, triumphed over its machinations; for though all articles of British manufacture, as well as colonial produce, were prohibited in France by one consular decree after another, yet they found their way to that country, through the ports of Bilboa and Cadiz. At the fair of Leipsic, several articles, such as silks, cambrics, &c. for which France had hitherto been famed, yielded the palm to those of England, to the mortification of Bonaparte, and the great loss of the French weaver. The demand for British goods in India, and for Indian and British goods in China, had encreased to an extent hitherto unknown in the annals of commerce. In Turkey, our trade was visibly on the decline; the Italians and Germans had glutted the markets of that country with silks of all kinds, and cottons of a cheap but inferior quality. Our trade with Spain was still open and active. In the Baltic, our commercial intercourse branched out into several new articles of export, such as implements of agriculture, which were sought for with avidity, and purchased at high prices in Russia. We also engrossed a considerable portion of the carrying trade of that immense empire.

Bonaparte likewise conveyed an intimation to the court of Copenhagen that he could not view with indifference the partiality of that cabinet to this country. The crown prince of Denmark, was, however, determined to put the state that looked up to him in a posture of defence, so as to place it beyond the reach of surprize. The first object to which he directed his attention, was to encrease his military force, and to new model the army, so as to give it the greatest effect. In the course of a few months, the army in Denmark and Norway amounted to one hundred and twelve thousand regular troops. The garrison of Copenhagen was augmented to six regiments of artillery, two battalions of light infantry, a corps of marines, and a squadron of huzzars. The citizens of Copenhagen formed themselves into a body of thirteen companies, and one company of artillery. The students of the university likewise took up arms and enrolled themselves under the name of The Prince Royal's Body Guards, so that the Danish army, including volunteers, &c. amounted to upwards of two hundred thousand men.

The British cabinet perceived the necessity of courting the alliance of Alexander, emperor of Russia, who was daily disgusted with the outrages of Bonaparte, on all those states that were too feeble to resist the torrent of his power. The subtil consul was aware of the views of the British government in this line, and did every thing in his power to counteract them. The cabinet of St. Petersburgh listened to the suggestions of the court of London, and the ties of amity between Great Britain and Russia became in appearance firmly united.

The circulation of English news-papers, as well as every other medium of intelligence, being interdicted in France, the soldiery and the people of that country were kept in a state of ignorance, with regard to what was passing in England. They were taught to believe that the invasion of Britain would immediately take place, that it would be crowned with success, and that France would then sit as the arbitress of the fate, not only of Europe, but of the world. In order to keep these flattering expectations afloat, the French journals teemed with accounts of rebellions in Ireland, and riots in England, so that the deluded Parisians really thought that there was great probability of success in the event of an invasion of England; and general Grosbert was engaged by Bonaparte to draw up, what was called A PLAN FOR THE INVASION OF ENGLAND. The general had served in Egypt, where he had acquired no small portion of military fame, so that his name added considerable weight among his countrymen, to whatever flowed from his pen. This plan was diffused over all France; and a curious publication, which was well calculated, from the plausibility of the reasoning made use of, to work upon the misguided apprehensions of the soldiery and people of France. This plan, however, was as futile as it was vaunting, and therefore was treated with derision by the people of England.

All the powers of Europe suspended as it were their own public concerns, that they might mark the operations of Great Britain and France. Victory perched on the British flag in every quarter of the globe, whilst, on the other hand, the French navy was reduced beyond all former example. Upwards of twenty-five thousand of her prime seamen had fallen victims to the climate of Saint Domingo, in Bonaparte's ill-concerted expedition against that island.

The Prince of Wales evinced the most exemplary conduct and patriotism at this period: his royal highness was active in the inspection of the public works that were carrying forward in the most vulnerable parts of the kingdom. He visited Portsmouth, where the fleet lay at anchor, under the command of admiral Montagu; and his royal highness was received with all the honours due to his exalted rank.

The phrenzy of the French nation in the matter of religion, by this time, was greatly subsided, and Bonaparte, who had till of late shewn but little regard even to the outward shew of religion, was at one time a professor of Christianity, and the next minute an apparent proselyte of Mohammedanism (r), as best suited his turn; but now he began to affect a zeal for the Catholic faith, he frequented mass, seemed very devout, assisted in the performances of all the rites of that church, and though he promised that the Protestants of France should be placed on an equal footing with the Catholics, yet it was doubtless better policy in him to render the latter the predominant religion of the state.

Towards the close of the last session of parliament, the legislature had directed its attention to the migrations from the Highlands of Scotland to America, a subject worthy of the deepest attention, as the persons who thus migrated, consisted of the most useful and industrious part of the community. A committee was therefore appointed to inquire into all the circumstances connected with this matter, and to report their opinion thereof, which they did in the course of a few weeks. The first object which the committee recommended was, "to regulate the vessels carrying passengers to America, &c. with respect to the number of passengers which they shall be allowed to carry, in proportion to the tonnage of such vessels, as well as with respect to the provision of proper necessaries for the voyage." In the investigation of this business, it appeared that the avidity of the captains of these American ships was such, that they neither consulted the number, convenience, nor health, of these emigrants, nor yet their provisions. The following relation reported by the committee, will set the whole in a clear point of view: it appeared, that in 1791, an emigrant ship took passengers at Skye, for Carolina. "The vessel was about two hundred and fifty tons burthen. The number of passengers about four hundred, including women and children: so that their situation was most uncomfortable and dangerous, there being hardly room for them to stretch themselves. There were three tiers of beds fore and aft, and two midship. The births for a full passenger were eighteen inches broad.

(r) Bonaparte in his letter to cardinal Mathei, dated January 1st, 1797, says, "It shall be my peculiar care to prevent any alteration being made in the religion of our fathers."

"People of Egypt, you will be told that I come to destroy your religion. Believe it not. I come to restore to you your rights, to punish usurpers, and I respect God, his prophet, and the Koran, more than the Mamelukes." (Bonaparte's Proclamation, July 2d, 1798.)—"Tell the people that we are Musselmen. Are we not the persons that ruined the pope?" (Ibid.)

"You may assure Diocesans, that the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion, shall not only be respected, but that their ministers shall be specially protected." (Letter to the Bishop of Malta, 1798.)—"I hope the period is not distant, when I shall be able to unite all wise and well-informed men; to establish an uniform regime, founded on the principles of the Alcoran, which are the only true principles, and which alone can constitute the happiness of mankind." (Letter to Sheikh Missiri, August 29, 1798.)—"The real enemy of Islamism, is Russia. The emperor has made himself Grand Master of Malta, that is, has made a vow to carry on war against Musselmen. Is he not the head of the great church, that is, of the most numerous enemies of Islamism?" (Letter to the Grand Vizir, August 18, 1799.)

Those

Those fore and aft were only about two feet high, including the space occupied by bedding, so that it was scarcely possible to creep into them. The others were a little higher, so that the passenger could turn himself on his side, and rest on his elbow. To add to these calamities, they neither had sufficiency of victuals, nor proper cooking utensils, there being only two pots of twenty-four pints each, which were quite inadequate to the preparation, in any reasonable time of a meal for four hundred persons. Had the vessel made out its voyage, the chief part of the people must have been consumed by disease and filth, which last was horrible; but after being twelve days at sea, the ship was dismasted, and put back to Greenock, where many of the passengers, especially the children, died from the effects of the short voyage which they had made. These unfortunate people were completely cured of their passion for America, and happily found an asylum in the benevolence of Mr. David Dale, who employed them in his extensive cotton manufactory, in the vicinity of Glasgow."

The example of Mr. Dale was followed by others, who endeavoured to ameliorate the condition (which before this period was rather miserable from the servitude in which they were kept by their lairds, and the want of employment,) of a large portion of the inhabitants in the Highlands of Scotland, and the islands adjoining.

War had for some time been carried on in the island of Ceylon, and the English were every where successful. In the middle of the island, however, is the kingdom of Candy, and disputes subsisted between the sovereign of that district and the English, and the honourable Mr. North tried every measure without effect, that could tend to conciliate the good-will of the Candeans, but was obliged to resort at last to arms. On the 25th of September, 1803, intelligence was brought to England, that the natives were driven from several important positions, by the fifty-first regiment, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Logan. These successes were so rapid, that the king of Candy, with all the court, fled to his capital, which is seated perhaps in one of the finest countries in the world (s).

Sir James Saumarez, on board the Cerberus, having been joined by the Terror bomb and the Sulphur, sailed on the 12th of September, from Guernsey roads, in company with the Charwell and Carteret cutters, and after many impediments in consequence of contrary winds, appeared before Granville; when, reconnoitring the enemy's gun vessels, and other craft within the pier, and the different batteries by which they were protected, he anchored as near shore as the tide would permit, having only sixteen feet at low water. The other vessels having joined, a brisk fire was commenced, which was returned from the batteries. The fire was so well directed from the ships, particularly the bombs from the Terror, that much mischief was done to the town. The fire was kept up till late in the afternoon, when sir James ordered her to lay by. A few shells were thrown in the evening; but next morning the attack was renewed with increased vigour, although the batteries and a line of gun boats strove to annoy the assailants, but without effect. Upon sailing back to his station, sir James's ship grounded upon a sand bank, and remained there three hours before she floated; nine of the enemy's gun boats seeing her distress, attacked her from all quarters; but the vessels that had been in company, coming to her assistance, by a well directed fire, drove the assailants into the port with the greatest expedition they could make.

Similar prowess was evinced by the heroic conduct of the seamen under the command of captain Owen, who had so undauntedly a few months before affrighted the inhabitants of the town of Boulogne, by his defeat of the gun boats, which had vauntingly set off to attack him. This officer in the Immortalité, accompanied by the Perseus and Explosion bombs, commenced an attack upon the batteries which protected the town of Dieppe, as well as upon seventeen vessels which were building there, at eight o'clock in the morning of the 14th. The firing was continued on both sides till past eleven, when the tide making strong, and the town having taken fire badly in one place, and slightly in two others, the vessels weighed, and proceeded till they arrived off St. Vallery en Caux, where six vessels were constructing. At three in the afternoon, captain Owen opened his fire for an hour, and the enemy were not only soon driven from the batteries; but the town's-people were compelled to seek shelter in the neighbouring fields.

In the affairs of Ireland, we have to observe, that amongst those who had forfeited their lives to the offended laws of their country, in cases of high treason, was R. Emmet, who from his trial appeared to be the grand director of the conspiracy. He was a person of talents, improved by an excellent education, and descended from an ancient family, many branches of which had distinguished themselves in the learned professions. In his address to the court, immediately previous to sentence of condemnation being passed on him, he said, "I have been accused of being actuated by a wish to bring about a revolution of this country, through the means of French influence. I deny that either myself, or the provisional government had such an idea in contemplation. As to French influence, it cannot be too much deprecated; and I exhort the people of Ireland to beware of such assistance. I urge them in the strongest manner to burn their houses, nay, even the very grass on which a Frenchman shall land." In his way to the place of execution, his demeanour did not appear of that serious cast which might be expected from a person in his situation, or the religious sentiments he had uttered on his trial; he gazed about with a kind of light inattentive smile, approaching to a laugh; spoke and nodded to some of his acquaintances, until he reached the temporary gallows. On mounting the platform, he addressed the surrounding crowd in a few words, saying, that he died in peace and universal love with all mankind; while the executioner was adjusting the rope about his neck, he became very pale, and in the course of a few minutes, he was quite motionless. As Emmet appears to have had a considerable influence over the Irish traitors, his speech made, no doubt, a deep impression on those who heard him.

The Roman Catholic archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Troy, published an address to the Catholics, exhorting them to regularity, order, and peace; which was read in all the chapels of his diocese.

The disturbances in Ireland naturally called for exertion on the part of his majesty's ministers. The first steps were the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the Martial Law Act, these two were transmitted to Ireland by a special messenger, and arrangements made for sending large bodies of troops over, so that every measure to quell it was adopted with promptitude.

The political events of the most distant parts of Europe were so intimately interwoven with the affairs of England at this period, that they may be said to have formed a portion of its history. We shall therefore advert to the fate of Switzerland; which country had purchased her liberty at the expence of the best blood of her children, and when she obtained it, made the best use of it, by the establishment of those laws, that rendered public and private property sacred, that protected the weak, and restrained the powerful within due bounds—so that the marquis of Lansdowne was fully justified, when he declared in the house of lords, that if wisdom was hunted out of all the other parts of Europe, she would find an asylum in Switzerland. The Swiss maintained a neutrality throughout the whole course of the war between Austria and France, and the belligerent powers repeatedly courted their alliance: yet France invaded their territories under the mask of friendship. When Bonaparte first obtained the reins of the government of France, he promised that the Swiss should be left to the formation of their new constitution; which they had scarcely published, when they found that Bonaparte was determined they should neither think, nor speak for themselves; the people thus cajoled and menaced on every side, by French intrigues, and French troops, cast their eyes on Austria, Prussia, and Russia, but in vain. The English government felt for their situation, and would have rendered them assistance, but circumstances rendered their good offices ineffectual for the present. Talleyrand complained of our attempts to stir up commotions in Switzerland, which he represented as supremely happy under the government of Bonaparte.

(s) The very mountains in Candy are cultivated to their summits, interspersed with rivulets, villages, and cattle, with well trodden foot-paths, crossing them in all directions—fruitful vallies, with groves of areca, jach, cocoa-nut, limes, oranges, plantains, and pumple-nose trees, with fine villages and fields of Paddy, raggee, natchenee, and other grains: the paddy fields well watered by the streams rushing down from the mountains, altogether forming such striking scenery as is but seldom seen. The palace is an immense pile of building, and perhaps only inferior to that of Seringapatam. The town is about two miles long, and consists of one principal street, terminated by the palace at the upper end; there are also many lesser streets, branching off on both sides, but of no great length. The houses are chiefly of mud, and raised above the level of the street about five feet; you ascend to them therefore by steps. A few of the houses at the upper end of the street, belonging to the principal inhabitants, are tiled and white-washed. The palace is built of a kind of chunam, or cement, perfectly white, with stone gateways. It is a square of immense extent, one face of which is new, and not yet finished. In the center is a small square inclosure, which is a cemetery, and contains the tombs of the kings of Candy. The palace contains a great number of rooms, the walls of which are painted in the most grotesque manner, and covered with a multiplicity of inscriptions. Many of the walls are covered with immense pier glasses, of about seven feet by four. In one room is a gigantic brass image of Buda, in a sitting posture, with two smaller ones at his feet. The river of Candy is a very noble one, and swarming with fish, as their kings never allow them to be molested.

It now appeared, that the first object of the first consul, on the renewal of hostilities, was to endeavour to alienate if possible, those affections, which the continental cabinets had almost on all occasions professed for this country. His agents were therefore distributed over all the continent, and flattered him, no doubt, with the success of their missions. He was mortified to find that the courts of London and Stockholm had concluded a convention on such liberal terms, as left no room for future misunderstanding on any one of the points enumerated in that treaty. This convention was still the more excellent, as it was founded on mutual advantages, and was not calculated to raise any jealousy in the courts of Petersburgh or Copenhagen, which is a matter of something more than a secondary consideration.

It was generally supposed, that Bonaparte would attempt the invasion of England, towards the close of October, or the beginning of the month following. The preparations in the ports of France and Holland, for that enterprize were immense. Every ship-carpenter, nay, every man that could handle an ax, was put into a state of requisition, and obliged to work night and day. Troops were marched from every quarter of France, to the coast; and camps were formed at Boulogne and Calais, so that it was really thought Bonaparte intended to put his threat into execution, especially as every thing he wished was at his nod: men, money, and gun boats.—Men who were desperate; money that dared not be refused; and gun boats built chiefly at the expence of the Dutch. But we do not think he ever seriously intended it.

Bonaparte's threats of invasion were not confined to this country; it was extended to our old ally Portugal. General Lasnes, the French ambassador to the court of Lisbon, had presented several notes to the Prince Regent, in which he made the most exorbitant demands in the name of his government. He insisted, that the Portuguese harbours should be shut against all the shipping of England; and at the same time, he exacted the most extravagant pecuniary subsidies, and threatened, that if every requisition was not complied with, an invasion would be the immediate consequence. The Prince Regent, however, was not to be alarmed by these menaces, into any action that would have tarnished his dignity as a prince, or that would have thrown his country out of the arms of England into those of France.

In the London Gazette, of the 1st of October, 1803, is an account of the attack of captain Jackson, of the Autumn sloop, on the enemy's gun boats in the port of Calais. "After we anchored a-breast," says the gallant captain, "of the town (Calais) and pier head battery, the enemy opened their fire on us from all directions, amongst which I found they had mortars. The first shell fell within a ship's length of us, and burst under water, our vessels at that time were so close, that I thought there was a great probability some of their shells might fall on board, whilst I found our shot, though they all reached the pier head, would not go so far up as their ships. I therefore made the signal to weigh, and open to a greater distance, remaining at anchor myself. The squadron has been very fortunate in receiving no damage from the fire of the enemy. The bombs were now keeping up a well directed fire, many of the shells evidently falling in the midst of their gun boats. The shells that fell over the boats, went into the town, and must have done great damage; the east end of the town appeared to be on fire for some time. From the enemy's boats and vessels being covered under the land, it was impossible to judge what damage they sustained; but it must have been considerable.".

While the English were in Egypt, the bravery and humanity of the British officers, and the troops under their command, during the several conflicts which took place in that country, had won the confidence of the beys. These chiefs resolved amongst themselves to send one of their own body on a special mission to England: for this purpose, they pitched on Elfi Murad, a soldier of fortune, whose talents in the camp, and in the cabinet, had raised him to the rank of a bey. His address, fine personal figure, and his attachment to the cause in which he had bled (t), pointed him out as a person every way worthy of this important charge.

As he was not invested by any crowned head or state capable of maintaining the relations of peace and war, he was not of course accredited as a foreign minister, consequently he was not introduced at court. He had the honour, however, of a private interview with his majesty previous to his return to Egypt, being introduced by lord Blantyre. His audience continued a considerable time; and, on his return to London, he expressed the highest pleasure at his reception. He embarked a few days afterwards, on board the Argo frigate, at Portsmouth, and was presented with a portrait of his majesty, set in diamonds. He also took out with him several articles of British manufacture, particularly a fire engine, with which he seemed highly delighted. The main object of his mission was never publicly known, but it is conjectured, that one part of it related to the mediation of England, so as to bring about a reconciliation between the Ottoman Porte and the beys of Upper Egypt, especially those who had revolted against the Grand Seignior. Whatever may have been the primary cause of his visit, it is supposed, that the object of the Mamelukes was in a great measure obtained through the medium of the English ambassador at Constantinople (u).

We find that every measure was adopted in England that could ensure the safety of the country at this period: for this purpose, an immense number of volunteer corps were brigaded. Beacons were established at Canterbury, Shorncliff, Barham, Isle of Thanet, Shottenham, Hythe, Poolingdown, Westwell, Pluckley, Lynham Hill, Coxheath, Boxley Hill, Chatham Lines, Wrotham Hill, Ten(t) This Mameluke chief, who fought so bravely at Alexandria, where he was wounded in the side by a musket ball, which he concealed for two days, lest, if known, his danger should produce a cabal among the other rival chiefs, and dismay among his troops. His life was saved by the valour of the English. His suite, on his arrival in London, consisted of seventeen persons. During his stay in England, he lived in a style of Eastern magnificence; whilst at dinner, he was waited upon by four pages, and a secretary, who acted as interpreter; he did not help himself at table, but when he signified a liking to any particular dish, one of the pages helped. His epicurism was evinced in the delicacies of his table, the first the season could afford. When Elfi Bey dined with the prince of Wales, he was shewn the armoury of his royal highness, and passed some time in examining its contents. He tried the weight of the more ancient European instruments, and endeavoured to estimate their degrees of utility. He was particularly gratified by the sight of the Asiatic weapons, especially the choice collections of scymitars. As he was viewing these, and had half drawn one from the scabbard, he suddenly threw it down, seemed to experience a strong emotion, and leaned upon the arm of one of the company. When the cause was enquired, it was found, that this was the scymitar of his great patron, Murad Bey. He knew it instantly on drawing it, for he had often had the care of it when a boy The prince pressed him to accept of it, but he refused the offer, saying, "It cannot be in better hands." During his stay in this country, he never slept in a bed, but stretched on a couch in his clothes, with his mantle thrown over him; he sat up twice or thrice during the night, to smoak his pipe, which was lighted by one of his attendants who sat up; two of his officers slept on couches in the adjoining apartment. The Bey never stript but when he wanted to change his apparel.

(u) Mohammed Elfi Bey, was born in Georgia, and was purchased when a child, by Murad Bey, for a thousand sequins. He was uncommonly beautiful, and got the name Elfi, which in the Turkish language signifies a thousand sequins. About the age of fifteen, he was made an Aga, for the extraordinary bravery he displayed against some rebel Beys. In consequence of an insult offered him by Murad, he deserted from that chief, and joined the insurgents. Murad, however, repenting of what he had done, recalled Elfi, and loaded him with fresh favours. Passing over the intermediate rank of hiaschief, he raised him to a rank equal to his own. At the time he was in this country, he was second in command, but by far the richest and most powerful of the Beys. He was married to the daughter of one of the principal Bedouin Sheichs, and had in his interest nine of the ten tribes. His Mamelukes were commanded in his absence by Solyman Aga, an officer of inferior rank, but great reputation. Elfi Bey was remarkable for his courage, agility, and uncommon address and powers on horseback. He has repeatedly cut off the head of a buffalo at full gallop, with one stroke of his sabre. He was forty-three or forty-four years old, about five feet eight inches high, and very corpulent. His countenance was open, and his manners affable; but still the despot was stamped on his brow. He was a man of strong natural abilities; but his mind uncultivated. He could read and write, which is a very uncommon thing among the Mamelukes. He commanded in November 1802, at El-Hoche, a body of one thousand one hundred Mamelukes and Bedouins, the latter never came into action, except in pursuit of a flying enemy, and killed three thousand Turks, took seven field pieces, with all their stores, baggage, &c. On this occasion, he had but six men killed, and twenty-four wounded.

terden,

terden, Hawkehurst, and Goodhurst, which beginning from Canterbury or Shorncliff, were intended to be successively fired on the near approach or actual landing of the enemy on the coast of Kent, and on which signal, every one was to assemble at his known place of rendezvous, and there to receive orders from the general officer, under whose command the several volunteers and other corps were to be placed, and to whose quarters, on the first alarm of such an event, the commanding officer of every corps, was to dispatch a mounted officer, or non-commissioned officer, to receive such orders as might be thought proper.

The military tone of England was lofty and firm: it was not merely heard in cities, towns, and villages, but was re-echoed even in the quiet retreat of the muses. The young gentlemen of the University of Cambridge, proposed to form themselves into a volunteer corps; and for this purpose a grace was passed by the senate.

About this period, letters were received from Botany Bay, which contained a very flattering account of the flourishing state of that colony. The climate is very temperate, the prospects extremely variegated, and the vegetation amazingly rapid. These letters contain an account of the physical and civil progress of society in that remote quarter of the world. Schools had been planted, and a system of education established, which was calculated to improve the mind, and render the pupils useful members of society. A theatre was also erected, and some of our best plays were performed in the presence of numerous audiences; and a newspaper was likewise established, which was often replete with interesting matter. But the introduction of spiritous liquors, that bane of population and morality, tended, by the immoderate use which was made of them by some of the lower orders, to damp the expectation which might be entertained of the prosperity of the colonists.

The 19th of October this year, was appointed as a day of general fast, the solemnity of which was greatly heightened by several volunteer corps, who had not taken the oath of allegiance, either on their drill grounds, or in their respective churches, doing so on this day. Every principal church in the city and liberties of Westminster, was crowded with volunteers. The honourable artillery company, commanded by alderman Le Mesurier, upwards of one thousand strong, the two troops of Loyal London cavalry, and the third regiment of Loyal London volunteers, marched to St. Paul's, accompanied by their band, in a superb uniform. The lord mayor, the sheriffs, and other city officers attended with their different insignia. The first, second, fourth, seventh, eighth, and ninth regiments of Loyal London volunteers, &c. &c. attended in their respective churches. The Loyal City of Westminster volunteers attended divine service at the drum head in Westminster Hall; and notwithstanding it is the largest in Europe, it was crowded with persons of the first respectability. The St. Giles's and St. George's volunteers, after attending divine service at St. Giles's, proceeded to the Toxophilité ground behind Gower Street, and received their colours amid an innumerable crowd of spectators. The Law Association repaired to the Temple Church, headed by their colonel, the honourable Thomas Erskine. But the Christian churches were not the only places of divine worship that were crowded. The Jewish synagogue was filled at an early hour, by almost all the members of that persuasion in the city and its vicinity Upwards of three hundred of the most respectable persons of that persuasion took the oaths to government, with their high-priest at their head. They were sworn upon the book of Leviticus, having their heads covered, according to their custom.

Apprehensions for the safety of Ireland were now removed in a considerable degree, by the arrival of intelligence from Cork, that ten thousand troops from England had made good their landing in Bantry Bay; which reinforcement, added to the regular and militia forces at that period in Ireland, together with the yeomanry, consisting of seventy thousand infantry and fifteen thousand cavalry, left the government little to fear from the attempts of the enemy.

The Dover Castle having arrived from Madras, brought intelligence of the loss of the ship Nautilus, which was wrecked on the Ladrone Islands. This fine vessel had experienced a series of foul weather, which she encountered for many days, but was at length obliged to yield to the fury of the waves. Twenty-seven of the crew were lost, including the captain and the chief mate, and only nineteen were saved. An account was also received of a dreadful fire having broke out at Bombay, by which nearly five hundred horses were burnt to death; and the loss was estimated at six hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

On the 26th of October, the king reviewed the volunteer corps of London and its environs in Hyde Park. The corps reviewed were, the Loyal London volunteer cavalry; the honourable artillery company; the first, second, and third Royal East India Company volunteers; the eleven regiments of Loyal London volunteer infantry; the Bank regiment of volunteer infantry; the Bank Supplementary regiment; the first regiment of the Tower hamlets; the volunteers of Whitechapel, Mile End, St. George's in the East, Ratcliffe, Shoreditch, St. Leonard Bromley, Bethnal Green, St. Catharine, and Christ Church, making up nearly twelve thousand effective men (v). Two days after, (the 28th,) his majesty reviewed the London and Westminster light horse volunteers, the Westminster regiment of volunteer cavalry, the Southwark troop of yeomanry, the St. George's regiment of volunteer infantry, and those of St. James's, Bloomsbury and Inns of Court, Royal Westminster, Prince of Wales's, St. Margaret's and St. John's, Loyal North Britons, Royal York Mary-le-bon, Duke of Gloucester's, First Surrey, the Somerset Place, Lambeth, first and second battalions of the Queen's Royals, St. Giles's and St. George's, the Loyal British artificers, St. Andrew's and St. George's, the Clerkenwell, the St. Sepulchre's, the Loyal Britons, the Knightsbridge, the St. Saviour's, the St. Clement Danes', the Loyal Southwark, the Duke of Cumberland's sharp shooters, and the Gray's Inn rifle-men, amounting in the whole to nearly thirteen thousand effective men. The concourse of spectators on both these occasions was immense (w).

The island of Ireland has been justly called by Mr. Pitt, the right hand of England (x), and by Mr. Sheridan, the vital part of the British empire (y). It is therefore deeply to be regretted, that any circumstances should have taken place to weaken that arm, or those vital parts. Rebellion is one of the greatest misfortunes which any country can be visited with, as it is an evil that does not merely terminate in itself. There have been two parties for some years past in that kingdom, Orange Men and the United Irish-

(v) On entering the gate at Hyde Park, his majesty alighted from his carriage, and mounted his charger. He then rode forward, preceded by the life guards, and the royal grooms, with four led horses, elegantly caparisoned. He was met by the duke of York, the earls of Harrington, Chesterfield, and generals Calvert, Stewart, Burrard, &c. As the procession advanced, it was joined near the Ring by Monsieur, dressed in green, with red facings; the prince of Condé, in white, faced with blue; the duke of Bourbon, in white, faced with red; and the duke of Berri, in green. The French princes were attended by many of the French noblesse, decorated with the insignia of several military orders. Generals Dumourier and Pichegru were said to be in their train.

(w) The following general orders were issued from the office of the commander in chief, to the commanding officers of the several volunteer corps:

"Horse Guards, October 29th.

"His royal highness the commander in chief, has received the king's command to convey to the several volunteer and associated corps, which were reviewed in Hyde Park, on the 26th and 28th instant, his majesty's highest approbation of their appearance, which equalled his majesty's utmost expectations.

"His majesty perceives, with heartfelt satisfaction, that spirit of loyalty and patriotism, on which the system of armed volunteers throughout the kingdom was originally founded, has risen with the exigencies of the times, and, at this moment, forms such a bulwark to the constitution and liberties of the country, as will enable us, under the protection of Providence, to bid defiance to the unprovoked malice of our enemies, and to hurl back, with becoming indignation, the threats which they have presumed to vent against our independence, and even our existence as a nation.

"His majesty has observed with peculiar pleasure, that, amongst the unprecedented exertions which the present circumstances of the country have called forth, those of the capital of his united kingdom have been eminently conspicuous; the appearance of its numerous and well-regulated volunteer corps, which were reviewed on the 26th and 28th instant, indicates a degree of attention and emulation, both, in officers and men, which proceed only from a deep sense of the important objects for which they have enrolled themselves, a just estimation of the blessings we have so long enjoyed, and a firm and manly determination to defend them like Britons, and transmit them unimpaired to our posterity.

"The commander in chief has the highest satisfaction in discharging his duty, by communicating these, his majesty's most gracious sentiments, and requests, that the commanding officers will have recourse to the readiest means of making the same known to their respective corps.

"(Signed) FREDERICK,
"Commander in Chief."

(x) Mr. Pitt's speech on the Union.

(y) Mr. Sheridan's speech at the meeting of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, March 18th, 1805.

men.

men (z). The former were zealots in the Protestant cause, and the latter affected to be as zealous in the Catholic.

Many of the leaders of the united Irishmen fled to France; some were tried, convicted, and executed. Their declarations on the most solemn occasions seemed to be at variance with their conduct (a). It is certain, however, that they all looked to rebellion for the accomplishment of their schemes. They disseminated their agents and emissaries throughout the kingdom with a secrecy and vigilance that often eluded the most active pursuit. On the execution of Emmet, they turned their eyes to Thomas Russel, a man well calculated by nature and art to win the confidence of the people: they invested him with the title of "the General of the Northern District." Government offered a thousand pounds by proclamation for his apprehension; notwithstanding which he found means to conceal himself for a considerable time, although the most unabating pursuit was made after him by the officers of justice; but he was at length arrested in the following manner:

Mr. Emerson, a member of the attorney's corps, having obtained information that a stranger of suspicious appearance was accidentally observed in the house of a Mr. Muley, a gun-maker, in Parliament Street, Dublin, and therefore lost no time in communicating this circumstance to Mr. Secretary Marsden, who referred him to major Sirr. Mr. Emerson, major Sirr, and lieutenant Minchin, with a detachment of captain Green's yeomanry corps, repaired about ten o'clock at night, to Mr. Muley's, where they discovered the person, who had excited suspicion, secreted in a garret. On putting some questions to him, he instantly drew forth two loaded pistols, which he snapped at them, but each of them missed fire. He was instantly seized, and carried to the Castle, where his person was immediately identified by the honourable captain Knox, son of lord Northland, under whose patronage he would have risen to high rank in the army, if he had not forfeited it by a dereliction of his former political principles. After he had acknowledged his real name, he avowed his purpose in returning to the country, and spoke in the boldest tone of "the glorious cause" in which he had embarked. "It is that," said he, "for which I would meet death with pleasure, either in the field, or on the scaffold; but do not imagine that my death, or the death of hundreds, will avail to secure the existence of your power. No! though my arrest may prove some embarrassment to my friends, the organization is too extensive, and the plan too well laid, to entertain a doubt, that it will be relinquished." It is not easy to say, whether this was the language of confidence or desperation, but on his examination, he kept up the same boldness of expression, and instead of any attempt to soften down his guilt, launched out into an abuse of the system of government. He was fully committed, and on the 20th of October, was put on his trial at Carrickfergus. His trial lasted from ten in the morning till half past eight in the evening, when he was convicted on the clearest evidence of having conspired to levy war against the king, &c. &c.

When he was asked in the usual form, if he had any thing to say, why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, he addressed the court in a speech of some length, in which he took a review of his life for the last thirteen years, and on which he said he looked back with triumph and satisfaction, as he declared that all he had done was from the conviction of his conscience. He was executed on the 25th of the same month, and died with amazing fortitude and resolution (b).

The death of such a man must have operated against the designs in a great measure of the rest of the conspirators. The administration, however, took the most effectual measures to secure and strengthen the tranquillity of the country.

From this unpleasant scene we must turn to our naval affairs. The Gazette of the 6th of November, 1803, contained a dispatch from Sir T. Duckworth, dated on board the Bellerophon, off Cape Maize, in which the admiral introduced a letter from Mr. Loring, containing an account of the capture of the Duquesne, a French seventy-four gun ship, and the French national schooner Oiseaux, of sixteen guns. This happened near Cape François in the West Indies.

The generality of intelligence brought from the West Indies in the course of November, confirmed the successful operations of our navy in that quarter. As the forces, however, in those islands were insufficient for the entire conquest of the French and Dutch settlements, additional regiments were immediately ordered on that service (c). The French were preparing to make an attempt from Guadaloupe against Antigua, which was fortunately defeated by the vigilance of captain O'Brien of the Emerald. This gallant officer suddenly discovered thirteen armed schooners, in the movement off Guadaloupe. Twelve hundred troops were, at the same time, on the shore, in that island, and ready to embark. On sight of the Emerald, the schooners were steered back in haste for Guadaloupe; but captain O'Brien gave chace, and took three of them.

An expedition under the command of general Grinfield, destined against Demerara and Essequibo (d), sailed from Barbadoes, on the 2d of September. On the appearance of the fleet off the coast, the English in Starbrock retired into the country, to avoid any demands of the government, and most of their colony boats were sent out to assist and supply the fleet, and facilitate the landing of the troops, if the least appearance of opposition had rendered it necessary; but the Dutch colonists saw the inefficacy of opposing five hundred of their men to the force which they saw advancing against them, (the English amounting to one thousand five hundred,) so that they quietly surrendered. An official account of this affair was published in the Gazette of November 15.

(z) The United Irishmen undoubtedly coupled political with religious views. From their own declarations, joined to their conduct, it is now evident that the main object of this party was to separate Ireland from England. To gain this end, they availed themselves of every art that could inflame the passions of the unthinking, or work upon the feelings of the ambitious. They disseminated their sentiments through every medium. They conferred by means of their deputies, with general Hoche, and represented to the French directory, that England wished only to make peace, because Ireland was on the eve of revolt.

(a) Emmet in his defence on his trial, made use of these expressions, "I am charged with being an emissary of France; it is false, I am no emissary, I did not wish to deliver up my country to a foreign power, and least of all to France."

(b) Mr. T. Russel was a native of the North of Ireland, and descended of a family that once lived in ease and elegant hospitality. His father lived on a few paternal acres, which with industry and economy, enabled him to give his children an education suitable to their birth, and even beyond their prospects in life. Thomas having evinced an early passion for learning was placed under the care of the Rev. Mr. Stoupe, one of the first classical teachers in that part of the country. The progress of the pupil drew the attention of the master, who was highly pleased with his taste and reflections, that would have done credit to a boy of riper years. Mr. Stoupe, advised Mr. Russel to bring up his son to the church, in which he was certain, from the promise of his moral and literary character, he would one day become an ornament. But when the pupil was told of it, and desired to speak his mind freely, he answered, that he had a very high reverence for the clerical character, but at the same time, notwithstanding his youth, he was not ignorant of the great and important duties that devolved on a minister of the gospel, so that he preferred a military life to that of any other, and that he did not think the time he had passed in the study of the dead languages was lost, for in his opinion, a classical education was a necessary appendage to that of a military one. He was immediately sent to learn mathematics, and at the age of twenty-two, was presented with a pair of colours by his relative general Dikes. He served with no small reputation in America, under the command of general Knox, during the unhappy war in that country; towards the close of which, he was raised to the rank of a captain. His officer-like behaviour, and rigid observance of all the duties of his profession, were spoken of in a manner highly gratifying to his friends and acquaintances. On his return to his native country, he quitted the army, and was introduced to some of the best families in the North of Ireland. Through the interest of the Northland family, he was appointed a magistrate for the county of Tyrone. In 1792, he was arrested with Samuel Nelson, and conveyed to Newgate, Dublin, in which he remained a prisoner till 1798, when he was sent with Arthur O'Connor and others to Fort St. George, Scotland; at the conclusion of the last peace, he was permitted to withdraw to France. He lived in Paris during the peace, where, being a military man, he frequently mixed with several of the French revolutionary generals, and admirers of the new philosophy. Soon after the declaration of war, he returned to Ireland, with a view no doubt, of disseminating those revolutionary principles which he had imbibed, and which few men, unhappily, were better calculated to carry into effect. He was reserved to those above him, open and of the most conciliating manners to his equals, and to those of inferior rank, and possessed of that species of popular eloquence, which is so well adapted to inflame the passions, and captivate the understanding. He was six feet high, well proportioned, a military air, a marked countenance, and a determined voice.

(c) The sixteenth, forty-sixth, and seventieth regiments, sailed immediately for the West Indies.

(d) Demerara and Essequibo, on the Spanish Main, are in a high state of cultivation, and very productive. The following is the return of the shipping found in the river Demerara. Hippomenes, Batavian corvette, pierced for eighteen guns; Sophia, a ship claimed as English property; Rotterdam, ditto; Diana, ditto; Eliza, detained by the Dutch, before our arrival, under British colours; Nile, ditto; Admiral Kingsbergen, a sloop, Dutch property; Aurora, ditto; Leesfield, ditto; Wilhelmina, ditto. At Berbice: Serpent, national schooner, and five merchant vessels.—Total, nineteen.

The

The articles of capitulation obtained by the Dutch, notwithstanding the easy capture of them, were such, that the vanquished had no reason to regret the change. The first article provided, that the laws and usages of the colonies should remain in full force, that the inhabitants should enjoy the full exercise of their religion, and that no new establishments should be introduced without the consent of the court of police, as the legislature of the colony, and that the constituted authorities, and public officers, whether in the civil law, or church establishments, as well as the members of the respective courts, (except the governor general,) should be continued in their respective offices, and situations, until his majesty's pleasure be known. It was also stipulated, that the inhabitants should be protected in their persons, and have the free enjoyment of their property, with many other conditions equally favourable, which were religiously observed on both sides. Immediately after the Gazette announcement of the capture of these islands, a great number of ships were taken up to bring home the produce of them. An expedition was also meditated against Martinique, but a sufficient number of troops could not be spared for the enterprize; besides, the garrison was strong by nature and art, and would have cost more lives, perhaps, to have taken it by a coup de main, than would have been prudent to have run the hazard of.

The British cruizers likewise profited from the distracted state of St. Domingo. The Snake sloop of war, captain Roberts, on the 2nd of August, captured twelve vessels, which were coming out of Jeremie, and carried them into Jamaica. The English squadron closely blockaded Cape François, where three frigates, and sixty merchant ships lay, with their cargoes; many of which fell into our hands.

Thus were the prospects of the enemy frustrated in the West Indies—St. Domingo was wrested out of their hands; Martinique and Guadaloupe were so closely blockaded, that vessels of any kind could not pass in or out of either; the rich settlement of Surinam (e), menaced by our arms, and the distribution of our naval force in every sea, so judiciously appointed, so well manned, and so ably commanded, that Bonaparte centered all his threats against the united kingdom. Therefore, on the 4th of November, he went a second time to Boulogne, where he arrived about two o'clock in the afternoon, and immediately went on board one of the ships, where he remained till midnight in the port, inspecting the different works; the next day, the advanced guard of the flotilla, consisting of upwards of two hundred vessels, went into the harbour, and a number of English ships sailed along the line of coast. The cannonade then began, and even the French accounts could not conceal the effects of the fire from the English vessels, and the confusion which it occasioned even in the presence of Bonaparte himself.

On this occasion, the boats of the Merlin, captain Brenton, destroyed the French lugger Les Sept Freres, off Calais. The British ships Raisonable, sixty-four guns, the Immortalité and Leda frigates, attacked eighty-four gun-boats on the coast of France, sunk two of them, and damaged many more. Lieutenant Shepherd, in the armed cutter, admiral Mitchel, drove a French gun-boat on shore; and a gun-brig which was armed with twelve guns, thirty-two pounders, off Boulogne. A French gun-boat was taken (f) off Dunkirk, by Lieutenant Chambers, in the Conflict gun-brig. A French brig, with a sloop and a lugger, were also taken off Cherbourg. The Griffin sloop of war likewise had an action between Boulogne and Calais, with eleven French gun-boats. The gun-boats were quickly driven under the shelter of the French batteries. Sir Sidney Smith, with a squadron of five ships of war, off the Texel, drove twelve armed vessels of the enemy on shore, on the coast of Holland. Of these, three were taken. The Dutch complained in their news papers, that the English took their gun-boats, even when they had been run aground on the shore. Many of the Dutch fishing-boats were taken; which at first might seem rather hard, but this was a measure of precaution, as they could be easily converted into gun-boats and invasion transports.

The internal state of the united kingdom at this period, exhibited one of the most gratifying scenes that can possibly be drawn, if every circumstance should be compared. Among the most eminent instances of public zeal, the Patriotic Fund at Lloyd's Coffee House will ever shine in full lustre. The managers of that fund began their laudable exertions by an act of signal encouragement to heroism: they assigned an annuity of forty pounds per annum to the widow of lieutenant Scott, who was killed in an obstinate engagement which he fought as commander of the Princess Augusta armed cutter against two Dutch privateers, and another annuity of ten pounds per annum upon his infant son. They likewise presented Mr. Thomas, who acted as master and commander of the cutter in the same action, with two hundred pounds.

The face of affairs in Ireland now began to assume a more placid appearance; and in conformity with what had taken place in England with respect to the volunteer corps, the yeomanry of Ireland, who had contributed in a signal manner to effect the restitution of order in that portion of the united empire, were reviewed in the Phœnix Park, near Dublin, on the 10th of November, by lord Cathcart, the commander-in-chief of his majesty's forces in that kingdom. Colonel Hope, also, of the first battalion of Edinburgh volunteers, issued orders to the officers and privates of that corps on almost every point that related to their military conduct; and lieutenant-general Vyse laboured with activity and diligence, to prepare the whole military force of North Britain for the most prompt, effective, and steady service; and that no advantage of heroism or generalship might be wanting for the defence of that part of Great Britain, the earl of Moira was appointed to the chief command of the army in Scotland. The first act of earl Moira, on his arrival at Edinburgh, was to review the regulars, whom he complimented on their discipline and steadiness. He then reviewed the volunteers, whom he likewise complimented in a very flattering manner.

By the official return made out at the War Office on the 10th of November, it appeared that there were,

Infantry - -	297,502
Cavalry - - -	31,600
Artillery - -	6,207
Total	335,309

So that we perceive, from the above, that every measure was daily adopting that could call forth the energies of the country, in the army, volunteers, &c. in case the projected invasion from France should take place.

In order to try the effect, beacons were lighted at the following places, on the 16th of November, viz. Colchester, Wigborough, Danbury, Langden Hill, Cane Green, Ongar Park, Good Easter, Weathersfield, and Littlebury Broom.

The important measure of communication by telegraph, was adopted by government in Ireland, on one of the lines between the capital and the sea coast, established by the ingenious Mr. Edgeworth, upon the same plan which he proposed to government in 1796. The lord-lieutenant and several persons of the first rank in the kingdom were present, and were highly gratified with the effect of the experiment.

The Circe frigate, at three p. m. had the misfortune to strike on the Lemon and Oar, whilst in chace of a French privateer, on the 16th of November: the shock was so violent, that it tore away her rudder, and so damaged her keel, that she immediately sprung a leak. She did not remain long on this dangerous sandbank, but was beat off by the violence of the waves into deep water, where, being unmanageable by reason of the loss of her rudder, the leak gained so much upon them, that every hand on board was employed at the pump, the officers taking their turn with the men; all their exertions, notwithstanding, could scarcely keep her above water. In this alarming situation, they continued till seven o'clock the next evening, when their strength became nearly exhausted, and almost every one resigned himself to the fate that now seemed inevitable. Their signals at length luckily brought three fishing smacks to their assistance, which were prevented from reaching them sooner, in consequence of the boisterous state of the weather. The smacks immediately took the whole of the crew on board, in the most distressing situation, worn out with fatigue, and not able to save a single article of their cloathing or any thing else. When they were safe on board, the captain requested they would not sail immediately, till he saw the frigate go down, which happened about half an hour after they had quitted her. The fishing boats then made sail for Yarmouth, where they arrived the 18th of the same month, and put the crew on board the Repulse, admiral Russel's ship, where they experienced the most humane and hospitable attention. After the ship's company had been refreshed, they were consigned to the Galgo armed ship, and sent to Sheerness.

(e) Surinam, at present in possession of the English, has a number of excellent plantations, and was always considered by the Dutch as the most valuable of all their colonies. Its chief articles of trade are sugar, coffee, cotton, tobacco, flax, skins, and some valuable dying drugs. It is advantageously situated on the continent of South America.

(f) This was the first gun-boat that was captured from the enemy.

The state of parties at this time in Great Britain ran high, and as the public opinion was very much divided on the subject, a pamphlet was published which arrested the attention of almost every politician; as it was ascribed to the pen of a writer, who was allowed to be well acquainted with the topics in all its branches.

The great object of the writer was to justify the resignation of Mr. Pitt and his friends, in the first instance, and to defend them against the charge of inconsistency, in departing from the support which immediately after their resignation (according to this writer) they gave to the administration of Mr. Addington. With respect to the first point, he says, "as far as was consistent with their duty to their sovereign, the ministers did not hesitate to acquaint the public with the motives which induced them to relinquish their situations. Feeling it (they said) an incumbent duty on them to propose a measure on the part of government, which they thought of great public importance, when they met with circumstances which rendered it impossible for them to propose it, as a measure of government, they felt it equally inconsistent with their duty and their honour, any longer to remain a part of that government." The second point to which the writer adverts, was the promise given and withdrawn on the part of Mr. Pitt and lord Grenville, "of constant, zealous, and active support of Mr. Addington." The author admits, that such a promise was given, but insists that it was merely conditional, observing, that to give any body of men a promise of a constant support, let their conduct be what it might, was as inconsistent with every idea of public duty, as it certainly was with common sense or common honesty. The support, he adds, was promised by the ex-ministers, in consequence of their successors having "both publicly and privately professed their intention of continuing to act upon the same general system, which had been adopted by their predecessors;" but their subsequent conduct, he insists, was "a departure from the principles upon which that support was offered," and "afforded a proof of the incapacity of ministers sufficient to authorize and require a systematic opposition. The next topic of which the author treated, was the negociation that took place in March, for the re-admission of Mr. Pitt into the councils of his majesty; and in order to induce him to take upon him the administration of affairs, it was proposed, that lord Melville should be admitted into the cabinet, and some other of Mr. Pitt's friends, into different official situations. To this proposition Mr. Pitt replied, that he would not enter upon the question of arrangement, "until he was distinctly informed by a message from the highest quarter, that his services were thought essential;" and all that Mr. Pitt required was, that he should be at liberty to submit to his majesty whatever he thought best for his majesty's service, unfettered by any previous condition, and he positively declined committing himself upon the question of particular arrangements, until his majesty's pleasure had been distinctly signified unto him.

Such we may venture to assert was the substance of Mr. Pitt's conduct through the transaction; but Mr. Addington, in bringing forward the proposition of which we have spoken, endeavoured to make it a preliminary, that lord Grenville should not, in the first instance, be included in any arrangement whatever. His majesty of course was not advised to send to Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Addington's proposition fell to the ground.

At the approach of the session of parliament, public curiosity was anxious to know if the reports of the coalitions and secessions of parties which were in circulation, had any foundation in truth. Several members of the old opposition had on many important questions supported the minister, (Mr. Addington,) particularly Mr. Sheridan, who thought the present not a time to harrass administration with vexatious opposition, and that the situation of the country called for the united assistance of every person.

On the 22nd of November, his majesty opened the parliament, with a speech which was read by the lord chancellor.

So soon as the lord chancellor had finished reading the speech, the marquis of Sligo rose to move the address; which was seconded by the earl of Limerick; and after an appropriate speech on the occasion, from both of these noblemen, the motion was put and carried, nem. con.

In the house of commons, Mr. Cropley Ashley moved the address, which was seconded by Mr. Burland, and, of course, carried.

On Wednesday, the 23rd of November, Mr. Ashley brought up the report of the address, when Mr. Windham said he supported the address from a conviction that he was supporting the cause of his sovereign and his country, but in so doing, it was not to be construed into any the most distant support of his majesty's ministers, for such, said the honourable member, was the imbecility of administration, that he was ready to confess, that Bonaparte, and all his legions, did not appear to him so terrific as the men he then saw sitting on the treasury bench. They were men in general of good education, strong natural endowments, and pretty well read in history, but that they were men fit and calculated "to guide the world in its wildest career," was far from being the case, and he could almost predict, that the country would not survive their administration. They were the Augusti in whose hands the empire would fade and decay. The report was then agreed to.

On the 24th, the address was presented to his majesty, when he returned the following answer:

"Gentlemen,

"I return you my warmest thanks for your dutiful and affectionate address. Such a declaration of your sentiments, at the present moment, cannot fail to afford me the highest satisfaction. I have the most perfect reliance on your support, and on the exertions of my faithful subjects, to bring the present contest to a successful and honourable issue."

Mr. Addington obtained leave to bring in a bill to continue for a time to be limited, the acts already in force for restricting the payment in cash by the Bank of England. Having adverted to the expediency of the measure, he said, he had the satisfaction to assure the house, that during all the period of the restriction, the credit of the bank had been conspicuous, and entirely unimpaired. This in a great measure was to be ascribed to the prudence of the directors, who had not issued notes beyond the extent of its capital (g). Mr. Jekyl observed, that the scarcity of SPECIE was so general a complaint, that he wished ministers would suggest some remedy for the inconvenience. Mr. Corry obtained leave at the same time to bring in a similar bill for Ireland. In the committee of supply, one hundred thousand seamen were voted for the service of the navy, for thirteen lunar months; two millions four hundred and fifty thousand pounds were voted for wages; two millions four hundred and seventy thousand pounds for victuals; three millions nine hundred and thirty thousand pounds for wear and tear; and three hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds for naval ordnance.

As Bonaparte perceived at this period that the emperor of Russia leaned to the court of England, he treated count Markoff, the Russian ambassador, at first with coolness, and sometimes with insolence, especially in the presence of the foreign ministers. The count was by no means mortified at this "peculiar mark of distinction," as he called it; he wrote to his court, and was recalled. The chief consul affected to make light of this matter, but from the conduct of Talleyrand, it should seem, that Bonaparte began to repent that he had carried his insolence to such a height to the representative of a powerful court, and a young monarch, who could not forget the indignities offered to him in the person of his ambassador. Talleyrand waited on count Markoff, a few days previous to his departure, and apologized for some hasty expressions which his master had made use of, but all his protestations of esteem and friendship for the court of St. Petersburgh were ineffectual. The first consul was doubly mortified on this occasion; he saw that this circumstance put an end to all the hopes which he had entertained of being able to stand fair with Alexander the First; and secondly, that it would throw all the good wishes of that prince into the English scale. A short time previous to this suspension of (g) This is a very curious declaration of the minister: either he must have been most egregiously deceived, or else he must wilfully have misrepresented the case; since it is well known, that there is not so much specie in all the world as would take up the notes that have been issued by the bank of England alone.

communication between the courts of St. Petersburgh and the Thuilleries; the emperor of Russia had offered his mediation between Great Britain and France, but the terms proposed were neither agreeable to France nor England. But it does not appear that either Austria or Prussia interested themselves in this mediation; nor is it evident that either one or the other would profit by the accomplishment of it. It is more probable that they did not wish that the emperor of Russia should intermix with European politics. From being a mediator, such a colossal power might become a dictator; of which they had an example in the days of Peter the First (h), when Russia was enveloped in barbarism, and scarcely one-third so extensive and populous as it is at present.

Every attention was paid by government to the West India islands, and on the 10th of December, 1803, The London Gazette announced the surrender of the garrisons of Port Dauphin and St. Marc, in the island of St. Domingo, and several vessels of war, to the squadron employed in the blockade of different parts of that colony.

The garrison of St. Marc was reduced to the greatest distress. They had subsisted for some time on horse-flesh. General Dessalines (i) was on the point of putting the whole to death, when captain Watkins, of the Vanguard, humanely interposed, and offered to take them on board, which he did, and treated them with a humanity highly honourable to the British character. Port Dauphin surrendered to captain Bligh, of the Theseus. This gallant officer having learned from the prisoners, that their general Dumont and his suite, had fallen into the hands of the blacks, and that they were in the most imminent danger of their lives, he was induced from motives of humanity, to solicit their freedom from the chief of the people, and with much difficulty obtained it. Previous to the surrender of Port Dauphin, the boats of the Theseus cut out of the harbour the national corvette La Sagesse, from under a heavy fire of the batteries; and the boats of the Desirée frigate cut out from Monte Christe, the schooner L'Amiable Sophie. The only loss sustained in all these engagements, was that of the Garland frigate, off Cape François. The crew was happily saved. The conduct of our officers and seamen through the whole of this transaction, is deserving of estimation.

The design which Bonaparte entertained on our possessions in the East, was manifest on the conclusion of the peace of Amiens, when the chief consul sent out a squadron to Pondicherry, under the command of admiral Linois; when questioned by our ambassador as to the sailing of that fleet, he smiled, and said, it was with a view of prosecuting discoveries in astronomy and natural history, and that those who were called officers, were no other than naturalists and astronomers; but by letters received from Bombay, December the 15th, it appeared, that the squadron consisted of one ship of the line, with three frigates, and several transports, having between two and three thousand troops on board.

Notwithstanding the court of Spain gave the warmest assurances of her amity for this country, and her wish to maintain all the relations of peace with our court, yet the Spanish captain-general of Yutacan, demanded the evacuation of the English settlement of Honduras. From the haughty tone in which this demand was delivered, it was not difficult to perceive that it was made at the instance of Bonaparte, whose influence in the cabinet of Madrid, was now so great, that Spain might be called a political province of France. It is scarcely necessary to say, that the demand was refused, and was not again repeated.

The severity of the weather interrupted our intercourse with the northern powers, and our naval force was chiefly distributed into blockades, retaining their stations off Brest and the Texel, in the midst of all the boisterous weather. We must not omit to take notice of a gallant action performed at this time by the boats of his majesty's sloop Atalante, on the coast France. Two ketches and a brig, part of a French convoy, running under the point of St. Guildas, were driven on shore off the mouth of the river Pennerf. Captain Mansfield, of the Atalante, having considered it possible to cut them out in the night, as the wind was directly off the shore, dispatched lieutenant Hawkins, in a six-oared cutter, and Mr. Richard Burstal, in a five-oared cutter, on that service, after it became dark. About half-past nine, p. m. the boats got up to these vessels, when lieutenant Hawkins boarded and took possession of the in-shore vessel, but found her a-ground; a number of troops along the shore, kept up a heavy fire of musketry on his boat, assisted by two field-pieces. After cutting her cable, and firing a considerable time on the other vessel near him, he found it impossible to do any thing with her, and very properly left her to go to the assistance of the other boat, which had by this time boarded the brig, in defiance of a party of ten or twelve soldiers, with their muskets and sabres, killed six of the troops, hove two overboard, and drove the others with the crew below. After cutting her cable, finding she was a-ground, and a light vessel, they returned with both boats on board, not thinking proper, from motives of humanity, to set her on fire, as several people were heard below, whom they supposed to be wounded.

All the plans of the consular government at this period appear to have been directed against Great Britain. Taxes, subscriptions, the money voted for the repair of the roads, bridges, &c. was to be employed only for this purpose. The fortifications of Brussels, Louraine, Diest, Tirlemont, Ghent, Axel, Lerneuse, &c. were suddenly ordered to be abolished, and the money arising from the sale of the materials was directed to be put in the public treasury, that it might be applied to facilitate the projected invasion of England. Two thousand men were likewise employed at work on the harbour and fortifications of Boulogne.

The mighty preparations carrying on in France, roused the active spirit of the English government, who adopted various plans for the defence of the kingdom in case of an invasion. Every attention was paid to the recruiting and discipline of the army: every place where it was practicable for an enemy to land on the coast of Kent was planted with cannon, and lined with military, as well regular forces as militia. The foot-paths which the smugglers had cut on cliffs to ascend secretly with their commodities were either entirely destroyed, or altered so that only one man could ascend at a time, and be exposed to the fire of the musketeers from above in various directions. The pilot-boats, the fishing-boats, &c. were fittèd up as gun-boats, so as to carry each an eighteen-pound carronade. Fifty of these lay at that time in Dover harbour, in such a state of readiness, that they could all be equipped in a quarter of an hour, and manned with some of the best seamen in the world, viz. the pilots and fishermen, who were brought up in storms and dangers. It was calculated that, between Margate and Dungeness, upwards of two hundred of these boats could be collected in the space of a few hours by a signal along the coast. Their guns lay on the piers and the quays, numbered and marked with the names of the boats and those to whom they belonged, ready to be mounted in an instant. Some of them were placed as batteries, ready to be used as such, should any unexpected occasion occur. New lines of defence were also erected at Eastware Bay, near Folkstone, and manned by the Cinque Port volunteers, under the command of colonel Pitt.

On the 4th of December, the colours of the Royal Spelthorne legion, under the command of his royal highness the duke of Clarence, were presented to that corps by his royal highness the Prince of Wales, on Ashford Common.

Among the disasters of this year, we have to record the effects of a tremendous gale at sea. On the 20th of December, the wind shifting to S. and then to S. S. E. blew a perfect hurricane. The Rambler, a sloop of war of sixteen guns, which was anchored off St. Nicholas, began to drive violently from her anchors, and drifted towards the ledge of rocks, near Oliver Cromwell's battery, off Mill Bay. She fired guns of distress for a considerable time, which were repeated by the Salvador del Mundi, of one hundred and twelve guns, and signals made for assistance from the dock yards; but the gale blew so hard, and the sea ran so high, that no launch or boat could weather Devil's Point. At length the masts of the Rambler were cut away, and letting go another anchor, she rode a little easier, and assistance soon afterwards went from the dock yard, with spare anchors, cables, &c. she was then towed into Bampool, where she lay for a day, and then went up the harbour to refit. On the same day the Shannon, of thirty-six guns, near Cape la Hogue, received so much (h) Who, under the pretext of protecting Augustus II. king of Poland, opened a way for his successors to invade and dismember that unhappy country.

(i) The black general, a native of St. Domingo, whose personal bravery and address, has raised him to the rank of emperor of Hayti, the original Indian name for that island.

damage

damage from the hurricane, that captain Gower, who commanded her, was under the necessity of running the ship on shore, in order to save the lives of the crew, who were of course taken prisoners, and marched up the country.

The public prints about this time teemed with observations on a correspondence that had taken place between his royal highness the Prince of Wales and his royal father. On the 18th of July, 1803, the prince addressed a letter to Mr. Addington, in which he tells that gentleman, that the immediate danger with which the kingdom was threatened, "pressed so heavily upon his mind," that he felt it impossible "to withhold or delay an explicit statement of his feelings." Mr. Addington, in answer to his royal highness, acquainted him, that he had laid his letter before his majesty, and that he had it in command from his majesty to inform his royal highness, that, "the king had referred Mr. Addington to the orders he had before given him, with the addition, that the king's opinion being fixed, he desired that no farther mention should be made to him upon the subject." Being a little chagrined at this reply his royal highness then addressed a letter to his majesty, complaining of the treatment he had received, and received the following answer:

"My Dear Son,

"Though I applaud your zeal and spirit, of which, I trust, no one can suppose any of my family wanting, yet, considering the repeated declarations I have made of my determination on your former applications to the same purpose, I had flattered myself to have heard no farther on the subject.

"Should the implacable enemy so far succeed as to land, you will have an opportunity of shewing your zeal at the head of your regiment: it will be the duty of every man to stand forward on such an occasion, and I shall certainly think it mine to set an example, in defence of every thing that is dear to me, and to my people.

"I ever remain,

"My dear Son,

"Your most affectionate father,

Windsor, Aug. 7, 1803. "GEORGE R."

The Prince of Wales then addressed another letter to his majesty, but without producing the effect desired. A correspondence then took place between his royal highness the prince of Wales, and his royal highness the duke of York. The prince having made some observations on the extensive promotions which had just appeared in the Gazette, in which his pretensions were unnoticed,—afstating his standing in the army, adds, "My birth, according to the distinctions usually conferred on it should have placed me first on that list." The duke of York returned for answer, that so far as he could learn, it was not the wish of the king that a prince of Wales should consider the army as a profession.

On the 5th of December an interesting debate took place in the house of commons on the order for the second reading of the Irish martial law bill; but as the arguments which were adduced were of the same nature as those made use of on a former occasion, there is not the least necessity to repeat them. The bill was, however, read a second time. In the house of lords also a vehement debate on the same subject took place, when the lord chancellor recapitulated the arguments on both sides, and gave it as his opinion, that the political salvation of Ireland depended on the speedy adoption of the proposition. The bill was read a second time. Several noble lords delivered their sentiments on the remaining stages of the bill; which, in fact, were little else but the arguments repeated, and the bill, after a few days, received the royal assent.

The bank restriction bill produced some conversation on the third reading in the house of lords; when the lords Grenville and King thought that a committee should be appointed to enquire into the state of the paper circulation of the country (k).

The following is an abstract of the sums used for the service of the year 1803:

Navy	10,211,378	13	1
Army	8,935,753	12	3
Militia, &c.	2,889,976	2	11
Ordnance	1,128,913	14	6
Miscellaneous services	5,440,441	13	9½
Redemption of the National Debt	200,000	0	0
Exchequer Bills	10,150,456	3	3
Excess of ways and means for the year	2,406,292	10	3½
	41,363,192	9	1

Towards the close of 1803 and the beginning of 1804, our affairs in the East Indies assumed rather a favourable aspect. Our alliances were renewed and strengthened on terms of mutual advantage with some of the most potent of the native princes, particularly with Madajee Boonslah, chief of the Eastern Mahrattas. An overland dispatch, by way of Bussorah, brought intelligence that his highness the Peishwa had been enthroned at Poonah; and as he was sensible that he was indebted for his exaltation to the influence of our government in India, he ceded to the British a territory, of which the yearly revenue is estimated at seven hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds sterling. But these prospects were somewhat clouded by the appearance of Holkar, who inherited all the qualities of Tippo Saib; and with, if possible, an additional degree of hatred to the English name. As Scindia had, however, wrested from him a considerable portion of his territory, had cut off his supplies, and besieged him in Indoor, his capital, it was thought that he would have yielded almost to any terms; but Holkar found means to make his escape, and to collect an immense number of forces, who, lured by the scent of plunder, committed incalculable ravages in the peaceable dominions of our allies in that part of the world. Our government in India at this time concluded a treaty of commerce with the Persian ambassador, which promised the most favourable results.

The British cruizers in the West Indies were uncommonly vigilant and successful. The London Gazette, of the 3d of January, 1804, contained a letter from captain Younghusband, of the Osprey, off Martinique, describing his sending three boats to attack a privateer. The boats were placed under the command of lieutenant Robert Henderson: the cutter in which he was, rowing much faster than the other boats, he, without waiting to be joined by them, in the most brave and determined manner, and under a heavy fire from the guns and musquetry of the vessel, boarded and captured the French schooner privateer La Resource, mounting four four-pounders, and having on board forty-three men, two of whom were killed, and twelve wounded. The cutter had only seventeen seamen in her, who all behaved with the utmost bravery.

An action not less hazardous and spirited was announced in the Gazette of the 28th of January, in a letter from captain Graves, of his majesty's ship Blenheim, dated off Martinique. The captain stated, that having observed the French privateer L'Harmonie put into the harbour of Maria, in the bay of St. Anne, Martinique, with a prize, induced him to suggest a plan for the capture of this vessel, especially as she had been more destructive to our commerce than any other which had appeared in those seas; and for this purpose he attempted, against a strong breeze and lee current, to beat up from off the Diamond Rock to the place where she lay at anchor. Having reconnoitred the harbour of Maria, together with the batteries on each side of it, and also one above the town, he determined on the attempt. He therefore ordered sixty seamen, with two lieutenants and sixty marines, all of the Blenheim, to carry the enterprize into execution. The former, in their boats, to attack the privateer, and the latter, at the same instant, to surprize, or in any event to storm, Fort Dunkirk, a battery of nine guns on the starboard side of the harbour. The Drake having joined, captain Ferris, volunteered his services, and took the command of the seamen, to whom he added fourteen from the Drake. All things being ready, both parties set off so timely as to commence the attack at the same moment, which was crowned with success. The fort was completely surprized, the prisoners, fifteen in number, taken, the guns were dismounted, and spiked, their carriages totally destroyed, and the magazine blown up. The barracks were spared, as a large and ripe field of canes adjoining must have inevitably (k) This is an abstract of an official account of the notes of the bank of England in circulation, on the following dates, distinguishing the amount of those that are below the value of five pounds.

On the 1st June,	1802	13,257,600
1st October,	1802	13,111,510
1st December,	1802	12,075,020
1st February,	1803	12,874,030

Amount of Bank of England notes of 2*l.* and 1*l.* each.

On the 1st June,	1802	3,013,610
1st August,	1802	3,292,520
1st October,	1802	3,435,130
1st December,	1802	3,236,530
1st February,	1803	3,234,520

been

been destroyed, had they been set fire to. This was effected without the loss of a man on our part.

On the 5th of January, 1804, the Immortalité and the Archer gun brig brought two gun boats, a Dutch galliot and a schuyt, into the Downs. The gun boats were of the first class, carrying an eighteen pounder in the prow, and a twelve pounder aft. They fired twice at the Immortalité with their great guns, and kept up a brisk fire of musketry for about an hour. Their rigging and sails were cut almost to pieces, and several shot lodged in their hulls. They were cut off from the shore by the boats belonging to the Immortalité, close off the harbour of Boulogne. There was not a man either killed or wounded on the part of the English.

Intelligence was received, on the 26th of January, of the evacuation of the French post of St. Domingo, by general Rochambeau, and the troops under his command. This event took place on the 28th of November, 1803, in consequence of a capitulation between Rochambeau and the black general Dessalines. Admiral Duckford, at the same time captured the French shipping, consisting of three frigates, several smaller ships of war, and a number of merchant vessels.

The officers of government now directed their attention to every suggestion that was practically calculated to place the country in that situation that would set the menaces of the foe at defiance. The first measure was to reserve to the commanders of the volunteer corps, the power exclusively, to present to the commander in chief, such persons as they might deem fit to fill the vacant appointments among the officers. The delicate manner in which government conducted itself, however, in this particular, removed those apprehensions which were entertained, that it would not be palatable to the volunteers (l).

The great scarcity of silver coin, which was felt at this period by all classes of persons engaged in business was in some measure remedied by the emission of dollars; and British manufactures found their way into many of the great foreign markets. The Baltic trade, which had been suspended, as usual, during the winter season, began to resume an active shape; large quantities of goods being exported to Tonningen and Embden. The English merchants likewise opened a considerable market at Stettin in Pomerania, through which large quantities of British manufactures passed into Prussia, Upper Saxony, Poland, and all Germany, without danger of seizure by the French. The ports of Spain and Portugal likewise continued open to the English.

On the 1st of February, the house of commons met pursuant to adjournment. Several notices of motions were given, and the days on which they were to be brought forward fixed.

The next day Mr. Fox made a motion relative to one of the petitions presented against the return for the county of Middlesex. He said, there was one clause in the act (the 24th of the king) on which he should rest his argument: that clause laid it down, in the most unqualified terms, that the house should not proceed on any petition, complaining of an undue election or return, unless the petitioners described themselves in the body of the petition as persons having a right to vote. This was not the case either directly or indirectly in the petition of which he complained. Having enforced this observation at some length, he then moved, that the order of the day (February 3, 1804,) for taking the said petition into consideration be discharged. Mr. Tierney, Mr. Addington, and Mr. Sheridan, delivered their opinions on the subject, and the question being put, was negatived by a majority of ninety-six to twenty-four.

A committee was then ballotted to try the merits of the petition, complaining of an undue return for the county of Middlesex, when the sitting member (sir Francis Burdett) having waved his right of appointing a nominee, the committee withdrew, and retained Nicholas Calvert, on the part of the sitting member, and J. H. Browne on the part of William Mainwaring, the petitioner.

Mr. Secretary Yorke had given notice that he intended to bring forward a motion relative to the volunteer system, in which he took an enlarged view of the subject, and concluded by moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill to explain, amend, and consolidate the provisions contained in the several acts then in force relative to the yeomanry and volunteer corps throughout the united kingdom." At length, after a great deal of debate on the subject, in which Mr. Sheridan, Lord Castlereagh, Mr. Whitbread, and others took an active part, leave was given to bring in the bill.

The prudent measures adopted by the governor of Ceylon in 1803, made the English suppose that the good will and affection of the king of Candi and his subjects would be fully conciliated; and that matters would be placed on such a footing, as to put an end to those jealousies which the natives entertained of the English power in that quarter of the globe; but those hopes were too sanguine. In the war which unfortunately and unexpectedly broke out in the island of Ceylon, in the beginning of 1803, the king of Candi was at first defeated in every engagement, notwithstanding the multitudes he brought into the field. The British, flushed with successive victories, pressed on into the interior of their dominions. His capital was taken; but the conquerors found they had advanced too far, and having spread themselves over a wide extent of country, their numbers were insufficient to maintain all the posts they had taken. They were besides attacked with diseases, and ignorant of the local advantages and disadvantages of the country. The provisions in many of the posts which they occupied were exhausted, as well as their ammunition, so that they were on many occasions obliged to cut their way, sword in hand, through the island. This was what led to the disastrous capitulation of major Davie, who was always considered as a gallant officer. The garrison, which was cruelly massacred, consisted (l) The different modifications will be found in the following circular letter, addressed to the lieutenants of the several counties in Great Britain; by which it will appear, that our volunteers receive pay:

"My Lord,

"His majesty's confidential servants have thought it to be their duty, on further considering the improvements of which the volunteer system is capable, to extend to it every useful aid and assistance which it can receive, consistent with that due attention to that principle of œconomy on which the whole system is founded, and have resolved to allow of adjutants and serjeant majors on permanent pay to corps of different descriptions of force, consisting of the following numbers, without any other conditions or restrictions than such as may be applicable to the whole volunteer establishment.

"Cavalry.—To every corps, consisting of not less than three hundred effective rank and file of cavalry, an adjutant on permanent pay will be allowed (pay, when not called out into actual service, six shillings per day, two shillings ditto for a horse.)

"To every corps of cavalry, under three hundred rank and file, but consisting of not less than three troops of forty effective rank and file each, a serjeant major will be allowed on permanent pay (pay, when not called out into actual service, three shillings and eleven pence per day, including nine pence for a horse.)

"Infantry.—To every corps of infantry (including artillery) consisting of not less than five hundred effective rank and file, one adjutant and one serjeant major, on permanent pay will be allowed (pay, when not called out into actual service, six shillings per day; ditto of serjeant major, ditto, one shilling and sixpence per day, and two and sixpence per week extra.

"To every corps of infantry, consisting of not less than three hundred effective rank and file, one adjutant, but no serjeant major, will be allowed on permanent pay (pay six shillings per day, as above.)

"To a corps of infantry, under three hundred effective rank and file, but consisting of not less than three companies of sixty privates each, one serjeant major will be allowed, on permanent pay (pay as above, one shilling and sixpence per day, and two shillings and sixpence per week extra.)

"When the corps to which the adjutants and serjeant majors are appointed shall be called out on actual service by competent authority, these staff officers will receive the pay of their respective ranks, as in the line.

"The adjutants are to be recommended by the lords lieutenants, for his majesty's approbation, in the usual manner; but no recommendation of an adjutant can be attended to, unless the person recommended has served four years at least, as a commissioned officer, or a serjeant major in the regulars, embodied militia, fencibles, or East-India Company's service; and the recommendation must likewise distinctly express the actual period of the service of the person recommended, and specify the particular corps in which the service was performed.

"Serjeant majors may be appointed by the commandant of the corps, from among persons who have served at least three years as non-commissioned officers, in his majesty's regular, embodied militia, or fencible forces; and the period of such service, and the particular corps in which it was performed, are to be distinctly specified in the first pay list which shall be transmitted to the War-office after the appointment takes place.

"All adjutants and serjeant majors who are placed on permanent pay are to consider themselves as, at all times, at the disposal and under the commanding officer of the corps for the time being, and are expected to give their attendance whenever required, for the drill, good order, and management of the corps.

"It is not intended by this arrangement to make any alterations as to the appointment of adjutants or serjeant majors without pay; they will still be allowed to corps of different strength, as directed by the militia laws, and as before pointed out by the War office regulations of the 28th of September, 1803.

Whitehall, Jan. 14, 1804. "Yorke."

sisted of three hundred and forty-three officers and men. Thus the kingdom of Candi was lost as rapidly as it was gained (m).

In another part of India, the flames of war, which were thought to be nearly extinguished, were afresh lighted up in the neighbourhood of the presidency of Bombay. Scindia, a powerful Mahratta chief, took umbrage because the British espoused the cause of Bajerow, the Peishwa, and therefore declared war against the English. General Wellesley being invested with the command of the troops, (sixteen thousand men, infantry and cavalry,) commenced, without loss of time, the siege of Ahmednaghur, which was taken by escalade in three days, in August, 1803, with very inconsiderable loss on the part of the English. This fortress is one of the most considerable in the territories of Scindia, and the very key of his dominions.

In addition to this important acquisition, the Bombay troops, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Woodington, had taken Baroach, in the Guzzurat. Great havoc took place of the Arabs in the fort, as the affair was decided by the bayonet. The only English officer killed in this dreadful conflict was captain Temple, of the eighty-sixth regiment. Holkar, it is said, offered to remain neuter, on condition that he should share in the spoils of his rivals. A considerable force at the same time marched from the Bengal provinces into the country belonging to the rajah of Benares, so that the native princes in hostility were to be attacked on all sides. The Malabarians threatened to give the English a good deal of trouble, but were quiet by the prudent conduct of the government.

In the West Indies the British cruizers were remarkably successful. Lieutenant Canning, of his majesty's ship Desirée, on the 18th of August, 1803, brought out of Monte Christi Roads five schooners and a sloop under a heavy fire from the batteries; and on the 4th of September, our boats, manned by a part of the crew of the Desirée, brought out of the same roads six sail of schooners, being all the vessels in that anchorage. Sir T. Duckworth transmitted a list of vessels, captured, detained, and destroyed, by his majesty's ships under his command on the Jamaica station, to the amount of forty-five, in the space of six weeks.

The London Gazette of the 7th of February, 1804, announced the destruction of the French national brig La Mutiné, on the coast of Cuba, by captain Austin Bissel, of his majesty's ship Racoon. La Mutiné received so much damage, that all her masts went overboard, and she was full of water. She carried eighteen long eighteen pounders, and was full of men, from Port au Paix bound to St. Jago. This happened on the 18th of August, 1803.

Captain Bissel likewise on the 13th of October, when standing in for the coast of Cuba, observed several vessels to windward coming close along the shore, all of whom hauled in towards Cumberland Harbour before sun-set. He anchored in a small bay, in expectation of seeing them pass by in the night: day-light on the 14th discovered nine or ten sail, a few miles to the windward, nearly becalmed. He got under weigh with a fine land wind, and chased them: a brig, schooner, and cutter (full of men) hoisted French colours, and fired guns to windward. The brig attempted to get in shore, while the other two, with the assistance of their sweeps and boats, endeavoured to join her. He had only time to send an officer and a small party of men to secure the brig, before his attention was called to the schooner and cutter, who had by this time got nearly within gun-shot, and were firing at him. When within pistol-shot, he fired a broadside at the cutter, which was as speedily returned with long guns and musquetry; he then wore round, and fired the other broadside into the schooner, and so on alternately, keeping up a running fight, and preventing either of them from raking him. This kind of engagement lasted more than an hour, both schooner and cutter keeping up an incessant fire of musquetry; nor was it until the cutter was literally beaten to a wreck, and had many men killed, that she struck her colours: the schooner seeing her companion fall, made off under all sail. Lieutenant Lawrence took possession of the cutter, and captain Bissel then made sail after the schooner with a fresh breeze. He again got within gun-shot of her, and, after firing a few shot, she surrendered without further resistance. After gaining possession of the schooner, he chased another brig, which proved to be an American: he then stood in shore to rejoin the brig he had taken in the morning, but had the mortification to find that, while he was engaging the schooner and cutter, they had overpowered the officer, and had run her on shore on the rocks, where they had all landed with their arms: he, however, got all his men back safe. The brig was called La Petite Fille, commanded by M. Piquet, and had on board one hundred and eighty troops, including about fifty officers of all ranks: the schooner, La Jeune Aigle, of six small guns, commanded by M. Serin, had on board eighty troops: the cutter, L'Amelie, commanded by M. du Puy, carrying four long guns, and many swivels, with upwards of seventy troops. Their loss is about forty killed and wounded. The damage the Racoon received was immaterial, being principally in her sails.

In returning to the affairs of Europe, the situation of our own country is entitled to the first consideration. Ministers continued to receive the warmest assurances from Spain, of her intention to observe the most rigid neutrality, and to remain on a friendly footing with the English; our friendship with Russia and Sweden, was daily strengthened by mutual acts of kindness and civility. The prepa-

(m) The following extract from the dispatch, which appeared in the London Gazette of the 7th of February, 1804, from the honourable Frederic North, dated Columbo, July 8, 1803, will explain the circumstances of this massacre much better than any abstract account:

"I enclose the deposition of a person, stating himself to be an eye-witness of one of the most atrocious acts of perfidy and cruelty ever committed. Every particular of the narration may not be true, but it appears that Candi was attacked in the midst of a truce by the first Adigaar, on the 23d, or rather, I believe, on the 24th ult. That major Davie, commanding the garrison there, capitulated on the following day, and that after he left the fort, all the English soldiers who accompanied him were treacherously murdered in cold blood. I cannot believe that major Davie would have consented to evacuate on any terms less favourable, than those stated in the deposition, viz. of being allowed to proceed with arms and ammunition to Trincomalee, and that care should be taken of the sick, whom he left behind; for the fort was rendered, in the opinion of most military men, tenable against any force that was likely to be brought against it, and large supplies of provisions had been sent thither, in addition to those which lieutenant-colonel Barbut declared to be sufficient for six months consumption, two months ago. Lieutenant Huskisson was also on the road from Trincomalee (as major Davie must have known) with a hundred Doolies, under an escort of one hundred and fifty Malays; and when I heard of the breach of the truce, I ordered lieutenant-colonel Hunter to proceed from Trincomalee with two hundred of his majesty's tenth regiment, and fifty Malays, to secure the evacuation, which, had it been delayed for a fortnight, would have been effected with safety. But what I can less account for, is, that major Davie, having obtained such terms, could have consented to lay down his arms; when he must have felt that the person who insisted on such infraction of agreement, could have no other design but that of murdering him and his men; and when he must, in common with all the army, have known that a corps of forty Europeans, in good health, and of two hundred Malays, might cut their way through an army of Candians, to any part of the island. Indeed, captain Mudge, late commandant of Fort Macdowall, brought off his men in circumstances of as great difficulty; and a small detachment of twenty-two invalid Malays, fourteen convalescents of the nineteenth regiment from Candi, and sixty sepoys, under lieutenant Nixon, ensign Grant, and ensign Smellie, defended themselves in a miserable little fort of fascines at Dembadenia, for more than a week, against an immense multitude collected by the second Adigaar, after they had expended their ammunition, till they were relieved by a detachment of fifty Europeans, and as many sepoys, whom I sent, under the command of captain Blackall, of the fifty-first, to bring them down, in which he succeeded without loss. Under the impression of so dreadful a misfortune, it is satisfactory to me to state, that an opinion formed of a spirit of defection in his majesty's Malay regiment, is perfectly unfounded. Some individuals had indeed deserted from Candi; but the great majority, including all officers of influence and respectability, were staunch to the end. Those who, after the English were separated from them, were forced into the Candian service, were certainly not blameable; and of these, five have already escaped, and arrived here, who say, that all the others are ready to follow their example. The princes of that nation, who are settled at Columbo, waited on me as soon as the melancholy intelligence arrived, to assure me of their regret and indignation, at hearing that any Malays had deserted, and of their invariable attachment to the British government. To this extract is annexed the deposition of Milihanage Joannes, a Lascoryn of the reformed religion, who had made his escape from Candi. In this affidavit he stated, that he was present when major Davie received an ola from the Adigaar, which the major read, importing, that the whole might proceed to Trincomalee, without receiving any molestation; and that the next day (the 7th of June, 1803,) they set out with arms and ammunition. On the third day of their march, as they were preparing to cross a river on a raft, an order came from the Adigaar to major Davie, to make his men lay down their arms, and return to Candi; which, after some time, they consented to. On their way they came to a village, where two cannons were placed, when the Malays were ordered to separate from the rest, and to proceed to Candi, which they did. Soon afterwards, all the prisoners were taken, two by two, and delivered over to the Candians, who took them to a little distance and cut their heads off. They were going to kill the women, but this was put a stop to by order of the Adigaar. Major Davie, and the captain of the artillery, were carried off to the Adigaar; the deponent saw them the next day, and was told they were to be carried to Hargaroonketti, where the king was at the time. In the evening the Adigaar collected all the effects which the English had left, and ordered all the cannon to be fired without ball, as a mark of rejoicing."

rations

rations for the pretended invasion were carried on with great activity in all the ports of Boulogne, Dunkirk, &c. but the daring attitude of this country, set all the threats of Bonaparte at defiance. Such was the vigilance and enterprising spirit of our cruizers in the Channel, that the French dare not venture to sail along their own coast, except in a few instances. The first consul prohibited the introduction of our manufactures into any part of the Continent, where his power could reach, particularly in the different towns of Holland.

His majesty's health had for some time been but indifferent. The disorder was supposed to be a rheumatic gout, which manifested itself in his feet. He had, however, so far recovered as to ride out occasionally. His illness at length encreased to such a degree, that on the 14th of February, 1804, the following bulletin was communicated to the Prince of Wales, and other branches of the royal family: "His majesty is much indisposed to-day." To satisfy the public on this occasion, a bulletin was published every day, signed by two of the physicians, in which the state of his indisposition was announced.

On the 28th, Mr. Addington declared in the house of commons, "That there is not at this time a necessary suspension of the exercise of the royal authority:" and this communication was heightened, by the announcement of the physicians that "his majesty was in a progressive state of amendment;" which ended in a compleat restoration of health.

The fate of the ship Caledonia is one of the most lamentable of the kind. The Caledonia had left Balasoa Roads on the 18th of May, 1803, bound to Bombay, with several passengers on board. On the 29th of the same month a smoke was observed coming up the fore hatchway, and a cry of fire was heard. It was soon discovered that the fire had communicated generally in the hold, the main and after hatches having been burst open by the violence of the flames, which raged with such fury, that captain Thomas (captain of the ship) Mrs. Thomas, colonel Paterson, &c. to the amount in all of ninety-three people, embarked in the long boat. In the pinnace, ten sea connies and lascars, seven of whom were unfortunately lost on the rock when landing. In the jolly-boat, were the gunner and fourteen lascars, four of whom were dashed to pieces on the surf on Malabar Point, in attempting to land. The total number of souls on board were one hundred and fifty-seven, out of which only seventy-one were saved.

We have to record, among the acts of benevolence and humanity that his majesty has occasionally conferred, the timely relief which he afforded out of his privy purse to cardinal York (n), as highly praiseworthy. "It is a transaction," says sir J. C. Hippisley, "that forms an epoch in the history of the house of Brunswick, as well as in the annals of our country." Several letters were sent from cardinal Borgia, cardinal York, and Pius VII. on this subject, to sir J. C. Hippisley, which are specimens of the unaffected effusions of grateful and illustrious minds.

On the 7th of February, the earl of Suffolk moved in the house of lords, "That a committee of naval and military officers, members of that house, do advise with government respecting the volunteers, and recommend such measures as they may think expedient, for rendering them more serviceable and efficient." Lord Hawkesbury opposed the motion on the grounds, that all questions of this nature were supposed to originate with his majesty's ministers; and the question was negatived without a division.

In the house of commons, sir J. W. Anderson presented a petition from Messrs. Boydell; the prayer of which petition was, that leave be given to bring in a bill to enable Messrs. Boydell to dispose of their magnificent gallery, and collection of pictures and prints, by way of lottery. The petition was received without one dissenting voice, and ordered to be referred to a committee, to report their opinion thereon.

The following members were chosen to try the merits of the Southwark petition: W. Burroughs, James Buller, G. P. Moore, Sir W. Paxton, J. Porter, J. Palmer, R. H. Lee, C. Chaplin, J. Frail, J. Farquhar, P. North, Hon. G. Lowry Cole, J. Baker.—D. P. Coke, T. B. Bernard, nominees. The motion was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Corry, that the house do resolve itself into a committee on the Irish Bank Restriction Bill; lord Archibald Hamilton said, he was convinced that the measure of restriction generally was a great national evil. It was first introduced in time of war, it was renewed in peace; and now that we were plunged into war again, it was proposed to be continued. The result of these renewals was, that the paper currency of Ireland had encreased to a most alarming extent, and the evils attendant on this encrease had been magnified in a proportionate degree. At the time the bank of Ireland Restriction Bill had passed the Irish house of commons, the amount of bank notes issued was six hundred thousand; and at the moment he was speaking, he found that their amount was two millions six hundred thousand; so that in consequence of the measure of restriction, there was an encrease to the amount of two millions. The proportion of gold to be balanced against this paper, might be about one million. Gold coin rose exactly in proportion as paper currency was depreciated in value. The effect of this depreciation of money was felt very strongly on the rate of exchange between this country and Ireland. For a number of years, the rate of exchange between Dublin and London had fluctuated from eight or nine to sixteen per cent. to the disadvantage of Ireland: but now the loss was far more considerable, it was as high as seventeen, eighteen, or even nineteen per cent, in some instances not less than twenty. The directors of the bank of Ireland had been censured, because they had extended the issues of their paper with such improvident liberality. If there be too great a profusion of paper currency in Ireland, it is not the fault of the bank directors. They have no controul over the issuing of notes by private banks of the metropolis, or private banks in different parts of the country. The principle on which the restriction was to be continued was the simplest imaginable. Its continuance was absolutely essential, as long as the restriction continued in this country. To compel the bank of Ireland to pay in cash when the restriction continued here, would be equally impolitic and unjust. The bill for restricting the issues of cash by the bank of Ireland, was, in fact, a bill auxiliary to, and coëxistent with, the bill for similar purposes in England.

Mr. Foster said, there were circumstances in the situation of Ireland, which were perhaps not generally known to the house. In the northern counties all business was carried on by means of gold. There was not in Ireland one real shilling, and even the brass was not of the first quality. Those who bought linen were obliged to obtain gold to enable them to complete their purchases; and for this purpose to give a premium of two shillings and fourpence on each guinea. Thus it was clear in the first instance, that the linen manufactory was subject to a drawback of no less than ten per cent. Much might be expected from a serious enquiry, and a strong effort should be made to introduce a suitable remedy.

Mr. Thornton lamented, that at that moment the paper of the bank of Ireland was at an actual depreciation of ten per cent. After a few observations from lord Castlereagh, Mr. Foster, and Mr. Johnstone, the bill passed the committee and was reported.

On the motion for the third reading of the bill, lord Archibald Hamilton said he understood, notwithstanding the rate of exchange had been for some time past increasing against Ireland, yet that the lords of the Irish treasury received their salaries at par. Mr. Corry answered, that certain officers from Ireland, at that time employed in this country in the discharge of their public duty, were paid their salaries at par. The bill was then read a third time.

Sir Robert Lawley having called the attention of the house to the indisposition of his majesty, was anxious to know if ministers intended to lay any explicit communication before the house on a subject which he considered to be one of the highest importance, and the deepest interest to the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Addington) answered in substance as follows: "I rejoice to have the happiness of being enabled to state, that in the opinion of his majesty's confidential servants, such a communication as that required, is not necessary."

Mr. Fox declared, that he should feel himself deficient in duty to the house, deficient in duty to his majesty, deficient in respect to the principles of the constitution, if (n) Cardinal York was the grandson of James II. younger brother of Charles Edward, and the last survivor of the unfortunate house of Stuart. His eminence early dedicated himself to a life congenial with the habits of his mind. Placid, humane, and temperate, he sought consolation in the bosom of his church, as the only apparent asylum to secure him from the storms that followed his family. The malign influence of the stars, which had marked the vicissitudes of his house, was not exhausted. At the age of seventy-five he was driven from Frascati, his episcopal residence, by the French, plundered of all his property, and urged to seek his safety in flight.

he

he could bring himself to acquiesce in the answer which Mr. Addington had just given. Hitherto the house and the public had known nothing of the indisposition of his majesty, except through the medium of the daily reports which had been published by official authority. Mr. Addington had told the house, that it was the opinion of his majesty's confidential servants that no communication was necessary. I have to say, said Mr. Fox, that I know of no such persons as the king's confidential servants; they are, he added, a body utterly unknown in any constitutional view of the subject. He knew of a body of individuals more particularly employed in the executive government, but they could only be recognized in that capacity alone. In a general point of view, they could claim no superior distinction, they were nothing more than privy counsellors. There was one, and only one point of distinction, and that was the circumstance of their being more frequently called upon for their advice by the sovereign, when any business of emergency occurred, and a council was to be held, and that was the only distinction between them and the other members of his majesty's privy council. And would it not be necessary to shew that this distinction was inseparable from the regular daily exercise of all the royal functions. From the moment that the sovereign, from illness, or from any other cause, was rendered incapable of discharging the functions of royalty, those persons described as confidential servants of the crown, were nothing more than ordinary privy counsellors. The source of their distinction was for the time destroyed, and it was ridiculous to talk of their continuing the exercise of powers expressly delegated from the chief magistrate in person. He should at all times protest against the doctrine, that certain individuals, stiling themselves his majesty's confidential servants, should assume the right of determining when a communication to parliament should be brought forward. For any individuals, whatsoever situation they might hold under government, whether as chancellor of the exchequer, or as secretaries of state, to take upon them the right of judging when an undoubted privilege of parliament was to be exercised, was an assumption of power which no former ministers ever did attempt in any period of our history.

Mr. Addington attempted to explain, and said, that he did not mean to dispute, that the ultimate determination should rest with the house with regard to the steps requisite to meet any extraordinary emergency arising from the suspension of the royal functions; and then protested, that his majesty's ministers did not wish to conceal any degree of information, which, consistent with their duty, could possibly be disclosed. They were anxious that nothing which ought to be known, should be withheld; whilst they were desirous of being regulated by that delicacy which, on a subject of that nature, was on all hands allowed to be so important.

After a few words from Mr. Fox, Mr. Addington, Mr. Pitt, and others, Mr. Windham observed, that parliament was called upon to trust to the statement of ministers. They were to be led blindfold when they were about to decide upon a subject of the highest interest to every loyal man in the empire. The language of ministers, if it meant any thing, went the length of telling the house, "You are not to pretend to judge when any early communication is to be brought forward; you are to go on, till we tell you when to halt. Continue your support; and we will be responsible. Do not be clamorous in your calls for enquiry; wait till we let you know that the right time is come, and then all will go on smoothly." Mr. Windham reprobated this doctrine as dangerous and unconstitutional, as it amounted to a declaration that ministers might, for whatever time they pleased, keep the country in want of an executive government.

Mr. T. Grenville observed, that it appeared to him, from the whole of the explanations, as they were called, that there was a constant design to divert the attention of the house from the conduct of ministers on the subject; and the attempt to divert it was made only because it would not bear discussion. After this, sir R. Lawley, who had moved the question of adjournment, withdrew it.

On the resumption of the debate on the Volunteer Regulation Bill, all the members that spoke to the question bore testimony to the zeal and patriotism of that body; and, after some debate, in which Mr. T. Grenville and others took an active part, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was ready to discuss the charge at a future day. The bill was then read a second time.

In the house of lords, on the 29th of February, lord King moved, "That an account be laid before the house of all pensions and salaries chargeable on the revenues of Ireland, and paid at par in this country." This motion was agreed to.

We have before observed that the flames of war had been rekindled in India, and that little hopes were expected of the restoration of peace in that quarter so long as the ambitious spirit of Scindia remained unsubdued. We had, however, every thing to hope from the courage and discipline of our troops. Intelligence was received in the month of March, of the capture of the important fortress of Pawngat; and farther particulars arrived of the attack on the fort of Ahmednaghur, by the reduction of which Scindia lost a revenue of twelve lacks of rupees.

On the 5th of January, the Æolus, of thirty-two guns, captain Evans, arrived at Port Royal in Jamaica, from a cruise, having with her a Spanish ship of war of eighteen guns, which she fell in with off Hispaniola. On firing a shot across the latter, to bring her to, the Spaniard poured in a broadside, which killed two men. This was instantly returned by the Æolus, which soon silenced the Spaniard, killing the first captain, the first lieutenant, and thirty-six men, and wounding a number more, besides carrying away her fore and mizen masts, and reducing the ship almost to a wreck: in which state she was under the necessity of striking.

About this time Bonaparte and his staff visited Boulogne for a third time, in order it was thought to direct the immediate embarkation of the troops on that coast, and to fix, in his own pompous language, "the seal of our ruin." After inspecting the gun boats and fortifications, he returned to Paris. But from the vigilance of the English ministers, it is certain that they expected the long threat of invasion would now be put into execution. In the North of England, at Newcastle and other places, orders and regulations were issued under the act of the 43rd of the king, "to enable his majesty to provide more effectually for the defence and security of the realm, &c." These orders were distributed to every housekeeper in Newcastle, as specifying the places of rendezvous, in the event of an invasion in that quarter, for such inhabitants as might be desirous of being removed, but who were unable to remove themselves. Each person was to provide himself with three days' provision, and utensils for cooking; besides which, beds and blankets, as no other description of property would be allowed to be put in the carriages appropriated for the removal of the inhabitants. Newbury, Ryton, Wylam, and their vicinities, were, in the first instance, appointed the places of general depot for Newcastle; and all persons travelling on foot, were particularly requested to take the bye roads, in order to keep the grand west road free from any interruption to his majesty's forces.

In Ireland every thing wore the appearance of a return of tranquillity; and the most active preparations were carrying on to place that country in a state of defence, but even in a menacing position. The fortifications erected at the Pigeon House, at the entrance of the harbour, near Dublin, were of a most formidable nature (o). And a great number of wooden frames, pointed with iron spikes, calculated to impede the landing of the foe, in such parts as are open to the sea. In the dock at Ringsend, forty gun boats were put into a state of readiness to act in defence of the harbour, which number was to be encreased. These boats were of the size of those used in the herring fishery, in the Channel. Each had a brass eighteen pounder in the bow, and from four to six thirty-six pound carronades abaft; and as the sides of the vessel were made stout, and if used in offensive warfare would very well carry one hundred men in each, with their appointments and provisions, and sustain a longer voyage than that to the coast of our enemy.

The Paris papers, in the middle of March, brought an account of the arrest of general Moreau, charged with being in a conspiracy with general Pichegru, Georges, (the Vendean chieftain,) and others, to assassinate Bonaparte, at the instigation of the British government. Generals Moreau, Pichegru, and Georges, were arrested: Moreau was transferred from the Abbey to the Temple, (o) On that part of it, fronting the road from the city, a strong bastion and counterscarp were erected, with a fosse and chevaux-de-frize in front: on this battery four pieces of heavy ordnance were mounted. Strong curtain walls, composed of stone, were erected on the south, north, and west sides, with a great number of heavy cannon, with loop holes, through which the soldiers could act with perfect security.

and

and nobody was allowed admittance to him. On his examination before the grand judge, in the presence of Bonaparte, he denied all the charges brought against him. When general Pichegru was taken, he was carried before the counsellor of state and police director Réal, and underwent a long examination, in which he is said to have behaved with great insolence, but which we do not give credit to (p). His examination was soon followed by the report of the grand judge, to which a series of letters and papers were annexed; the object of which was to shew that Mr. Drake, the British minister at Munich, was employed in the project of destroying the French government, blowing up the powder mills, and disorganizing the French armies. Among the accusations exhibited against him in this report, was one accusing him of having sent an agent to Paris, to execute this project; and these instructions, said to be furnished to him, as well as his correspondence after his arrival at Paris, are given at full length. In one of the letters Mr. Drake desires him to print an address to the army, not to suffer Moreau to fall a victim to the jealousy of the consul. This mass of fabrications, was printed and distributed gratis over all France, and copies of it immediately sent to the respective courts by extraordinary couriers.

On the 17th of February, Joubert, the president of the tribunate, opened that assembly with a speech, in which he said, "When a great empire, after long struggles, is at last placed on its basis, what can the efforts of enemies, or the delirium of passion, accomplish against it? The enemy's government organized assassination; and to complete the evil, we find involved in their plots a name (he alluded to Moreau) which has long been accompanied with illustrious recollections."

In this sitting, the brother of general Moreau, who was also a member of the tribunate, attempted several times to speak, but in vain, for some time. Having at length obtained a hearing, he gave way to his fraternal affections in the following words: "Citizen president, you have heard the orators of the government, you have this morning read the orders published by the governor of Paris; both these publications are in part directed against general Moreau. I cannot see without the greatest sorrow that so much pains have, for a long time been taken, to calumniate a man who has rendered important services to the republic, and who has not at this moment the liberty of defending himself. I declare to the whole nation that my brother is innocent of the atrocities ascribed to him. Let him have the opportunity of justifying himself, and he will clear himself from those imputations. I request in his name, in my own, in the name of his afflicted family, that his trial may be conducted with the greatest solemnity. I request that he may be tried before one of the ordinary tribunals; it will be easy for him to prove his innocence. I affirm that all that has been said is an infamous calumny." As soon as Moreau had done speaking he left the tribunal.

The conservative senate, on the 18th of February, waited on Bonaparte with an address, wherein the British government was not forgotten; to which the first consul replied in the following terms:

"Since I attained the supreme magistracy, a great many plots have been formed against my life. Educated in camps, I have never regarded as important dangers which gave me no fear; but I cannot avoid experiencing a deep and painful feeling when I consider the situation in which this great nation would have been placed, if this last plot had succeeded; for it is principally against the glory, the liberty, and the destiny of the French people, that the conspiracy was formed. I have long since renounced the hope of enjoying the pleasures of private life; all my days are employed in fulfilling the duties which my fate, and the will of the French people, have imposed upon me. Heaven will watch over France, and defeat the plots of the wicked."

On the 2nd of March, the following bulletin was published at St. James's: "His Majesty is going on favourably." In the course of a few weeks his majesty was so far recovered, as to be able to hold consultations with his ministers.

We have now to record an event of an affecting nature—the duel between lord Camelford and Mr. Best; the circumstances of which were as follows: On Saturday evening, the 10th of March, Mr. Best met a lady (Mrs. Simmonds) to whom lord Camelford was partial. Mrs. Simmonds wished captain Best to accompany her home; and, on his refusal, said he would have cause to repent of it, for "she would set lord Camelford on his back." Accordingly, at the Prince of Wales's coffee house, where they generally dined, lord Camelford went up to Mr. Best, and said, loud enough to be heard by all the company, "I find, Sir, that you have spoke of me in the most unwarrantable terms." Mr. Best replied, "that he was utterly unconscious of having deserved such a charge." Lord Camelford replied, "that he was not ignorant of what he had reported to Mrs. Simmonds, and pronounced him to be a scoundrel, a liar, and a ruffian." Mr. Best said, "these were epithets which admitted but of one course," and a meeting was immediately settled for the next morning. The place was not fixed. Lord Camelford desired the honourable Mr. Devereux, son to lord Hertford, to arrange matters with Mr. Nichol, who was named by Mr. Best as his second, as to the time and place. In the course of the evening, Mr. Best conveyed to lord Camelford the strongest assurances that the information he had received was unfounded; and that believing he had acted under a false impression, he would be satisfied if his lordship would retract the expressions he had used. This lord Camelford refused to do. They met in the morning at a coffee house in Oxford Street, agreeable to the appointment which had been made; and here again Mr. Best endeavoured to prevail on his lordship to retract the epithets which he had used. He said to him, "Camelford, we have been friends, and I know the unsuspecting generosity of your nature; upon my honour you have been imposed upon by a strumpet; do not persist in expressions under which one of us must fall." Lord Camelford answered, "Best, this is child's play, the thing must go on." In going to the ground, which was a field behind Holland House, his lordship repeated to his second, that he was the aggressor, but that he could not bring himself to retract what he had once said: that he knew well, Mr. Best and he were two of the best shots in England; one of them must fall; but whatever might be the issue of the affair, he begged of him to bear testimony that he acquitted Mr. Best of all blame. No remonstrance, however, could prevail on him to retract his words. They fired together, and lord Camelford fell, to all appearance dead. In an instant, however, he recovered the shock, so far as to exclaim, "I am killed, but I acquit Best; I alone was to blame." He begged them to consult their safety, and accordingly Mr. Best and Mr. Nichol departed. Mr. Devereux remained with him till a man came up, and conveyed him to the house of Mr. Ottey, in the neighbourhood. Surgeons were immediately sent for: it appeared that the ball had entered his right breast, and passed through his lungs, lodged in the back bone, and injured the spine. His lordship lingered till Saturday evening, the 17th of March, and died. On the Monday morning following the Coroner's Inquest sat on the body; and, after a full investigation, returned a verdict of Wilful Murder against some person or persons unknown (q).

In the house of commons, lord King having alluded to the state of the sovereign's health, expressed a hope that the (p) The manner of Pichegru's arrest was as follows: The broker, Le Blanc, was the person who betrayed Pichegru, who occupied a fifth floor in his house, for which he paid fifteen thousand livres a month. Le Blanc went to general Murat, the governor of Paris, and offered to inform him of Pichegru's place of concealment, and to deliver him up for one hundred thousand livres, (about four thousand pounds sterling.) This sum was promised him. The manner of arresting him was then planned. Le Blanc introduced the gens d'armes into his house at night, when Pichegru was asleep, and gave a key to his room, as they were informed that Pichegru had with him two pistols and a dagger; they opened the door with as little noise as possible, and rushed on his bed. Though surprized and alarmed, Pichegru conducted himself with the greatest presence of mind, and in such a manner that even his enemies were forced to speak highly of his courage, and even to pity his misfortunes. He jumped out of his bed, naked and without arms; knocked down four gens d'armes, and they were unable to hold him, though six in number. He almost choaked two, in pushing them against the chimney; a third he struck with such force upon the breast, that he spit blood; and the fourth he griped with such strength by the arm, that he cried out in agony, "If you do not let me loose, I will shoot you through the head." With a loss of part of the flesh he got loose, and Pichegru exclaimed, "Fire, rascal, and you will receive a sword of honour!" At last, he was obliged, from fatigue, to capitulate and surrender himself, upon condition of not being tied or chained. He was, however, wounded in the head, and on the shoulders, and had lost a great deal of blood. In dressing himself, he declared, "that if he had not been deprived of his arms, he should not have fallen into their hands." Bonaparte had ordered the gens d'armes to take him alive, and they were all picked men.

(q) His lordship bequeathed the principal part of his fortune to his sister, lady Grenville. He left several sums to be devoted to benevolent purposes. Soon after his lordship's death, the rev. William Cockburne, published his will, with some remarks upon his character. The following extracts are taken from his will: "There are many other matters which, at another time, I might be inclined to mention, but I will say nothing the secretary of state would afford that consolatory information which had been given in the other house of parliament. To which lord Hawkesbury replied, "That there existed at present no necessary suspension whatever of his majesty's royal functions or authorities."

Mr. Foster referred to what he said on a former day relative to the paper issues and exchanges of Ireland. He stated, that the rate of exchange against Ireland had been rising for some pears past, and had encreased so rapidly within the last five or six months, that it was then at seventeen or eighteen per cent. which, as the exchange at par was eight one-third, occasioned a loss to Ireland of ten per cent. Mr. Foster entered very particularly into the matter, and observed, that two shillings and four pence Irish currency was given for each guinea, which amounted to a premium of ten per cent. But why such a rise had taken place in the value of gold, was a subject worthy of investigation. At length, after a great deal of debate on the subject, the motion concerning the depreciation of paper currency in Ireland was agreed to, and a committee appointed.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole house on the Volunteer Regulation Bill, and after much discussion, the principal arguments of which have been before adverted to, the report was agreed to.

On the 8th of March, the earl of Hardwicke accompanied by several of the great officers of state, laid the foundation stone of the new bank of Ireland, on the site of the late house of commons, in College Green, Dublin.

At this period several tons of dollars were sent to Birmingham, by the canal, to be converted into Bank Tokens.

In the beginning of April, official intelligence of the most brilliant victories obtained in the East Indies, by generals Wellesley and Lake, over the combined forces of Dowlut Row Scindia, and the rajah Berar. The battle was fought on the 23rd of September, 1803, near Alljunty Pass, and ninety pieces of cannon were taken from the enemy. The English officers commanding the brigades, and the mounted officers of the infantry, had their horses shot under them (r).

In the general orders on the subject of this victory, the governor and council signified their intention of presenting honorary colours to the cavalry and infantry, and of causing the names of all who fell to be inserted in a monument to be erected at Fort William in Bengal.

On the 9th of April, a Gazette Extraordinary was published, containing dispatches which had been received at the India House, from Bombay. They related to the operations of general Lake before Agra, under date of the 10th, 12th, 14th, and 18th of October. In the last of these dispatches, addressed to marquis Wellesley, the general announces the capture of Agra in these words: "My lord, I have the pleasure to inform you, that the important fortress of Agra, termed by the natives the Key of Hindostan, capitulated last night (October 17), and the garrison, consisting of between five and six thousand men, marched out at noon this day (October 18), when the place was immediately occupied by our troops, under the command of Brigadier General Macdonald. The only terms required by the garrison were, protection to their persons, and private property."

On the 21st of April, dispatches were received at the India House, by way of Bagdad, which were published in the London Gazette. By these dispatches it appears, that the commander in chief obtained a most complete and decisive victory on the 1st of October, 1803, at Cassowly, over a large body of the enemy. General Lake says, that the army which he combatted at this time, consisted of "the whole of the fifteen regular battalions, which had been sent from the Decan, under the command of Monsieur Dundernez, and two battalions of the same description, which had escaped from Delhi. I therefore have the satisfaction of congratulating your excellency upon the annihilation of the whole of the regular force in Scindia's service, commanded by French officers (s).

General Wellesley, in a letter to the governor in council in Bombay, under the date Furdipoor, October 24, announced that Burhampore had surrendered, without opposition, to colonel Stevenson, on the 15th of that month; as did Assur Ghur, on the 21st of October, after a slight resistance. Assur Ghur was the last fortress in the Decan, belonging to Scindia.

On the 5th of April, a dispatch was received from the honourable Frederick North, governor of Ceylon; in which his excellency stated, that on the 28th of March, 1803, the king of Candi, at the head of the most numerous force he could collect in his dominions, attacked the petty fortress of Haugwelle, which was within eighteen miles of the seat of the English government, and defended by a small garrison of fifty Europeans, one hundred and sixty sepoys, and seventeen gun lascars, on the 3d, 4th, and 6th of April. All these actions were obstinate, but the last was by far the most bloody and decisive. After a combat of an hour and a half, the Candians were defeated with great slaughter, their guns taken, together with the royal standard, and more than one hundred and twenty Bengal and Madras Lascars, who had been made prisoners at Candi, and compelled to work at the Candian guns; those of course were brought back to the English service. The king fled at the beginning of the battle, and was followed by his secretaries of state, both of whose heads he immediately ordered to be struck off. A reinforcement was sent up on the night after the battle, consisting of fifty Europeans, and eighty sepoys, under Captain Hankey, to join captain Pollock, who had commanded on that day.

The London Gazette of the 12th of April, contained an account of the capture of the island of Goree, by a French squadron, commanded by M. Mahe. The squadron carried upwards of sixty guns, and six hundred men, about two hundred and forty of whom had been landed in the night. The garrison consisted of fifty-four white men, including officers, who made a noble resistance, but were at length obliged to yield to the superiority of numbers. Our loss consisted of one drummer, eight rank and file, killed; two officers, eight rank and file, wounded; total, nineteen. Of the enemy, three officers, and forty men, killed; two officers and thirty men, wounded. Total, seventy-five.

On the 24th of April, an official letter, addressed to William Marsden, Esq. was published, announcing the recapture of Goree, dated the 15th of March, 1804.

In the catalogue of our marine losses, we have with regret to state that the Apollo frigate, of thirty-eight guns, and about forty sail of the outward bound West India fleet, was lost off Cape Mondego, on the coast of Portugal, early in the morning of the 2d of April, 1804. Captain Dixon, the third lieutenant, and about one hundred of the crew of the Apollo, found a watery grave. This disaster was followed by the melancholy loss of the Magnificent, of seventy-four guns, captain W. R. Jervis. That fine ship struck on a ledge of sunken rocks, not laid down in the charts, near the Black Rocks, off Brest. The captain, officers, and crew, were all providentially saved by the exertions of the boats of the off-shore squadron. They were out but a short time when she turned over, and went down; so that her stores and guns, with the hull, were totally lost.

The rulers of France now finding that the Moniteur was doomed to be the only medium of their libellous attacks nothing more at present, than that in the present contest, I am fully and entirely the aggressor, as well in spirit as in the letter of the word; should I therefore lose my life in a contest of my own seeking, I most solemnly forbid any of my friends or relations, let them be of whatsoever description they may, from instituting any vexatious proceedings against my antagonist; and should, notwithstanding the above declaration on my part, the laws of the land be put in force against him, I desire that this part of my will may be made known to the king, in order that his royal heart may be moved to extend his mercy towards him." The day previous to his death, his lordship wrote, with his own hand, a codicil to his will; in which he particularly described the place where he wished his remains might be deposited, and assigns his reasons for this request in these words: "I wish my body," says he, "to be removed, as soon as may be convenient, to a country far distant, to a spot not near the haunts of men, but where the surrounding scenery may smile upon my remains." This spot is situated on the picturesque borders of the lake of St. Lampierre, in the canton of Berne, in Switzerland: it is shaded with three spreading sycamores. The centre tree, he desired might be taken up, and, on his body being there deposited, immediately replaced; which was according done, about nine months after his lordship's death. "Let no monument," (he says) "be placed over my grave." At the foot of this tree, his lordship adds, he formerly passed many hours in solitude, contemplating the mutability of human affairs. As a compensation to the proprietors of the spot he described, he left the sum of one thousand pounds. In another part of his will, he desired his relations would not wear mourning apparel for him.

(r) In this action, the Europeans killed and wounded, including artillery and officers, were upwards of six hundred; and of the native troops, it was supposed upwards of nine hundred. The wounded amounted to three hundred and forty-six.

(s) The total of killed and wounded on this occasion was, one hundred and seventy-two killed, and six hundred and fifty-two wounded.—Two hundred and seventy-seven horses killed; one hundred and fifty-four wounded, and one hundred and twenty-two missing.

Ordnance captured—seventy-one pieces of cannon of different calibres, sixty-four tumbrils complete, laden with ammunition, and forty-four stand of colours.

on

on England, scarcely a day passed in which the columns of that paper were not filled with something of the kind, either directly, or by insinuation. In the legislative assembly, every member that spoke, never failed to level his acrimony at this country, probably as the price of his permission to open his lips.

It is evident that the objects of the reports industriously circulated on the continent, were, to degrade the character of the British government in the eyes of all Europe; to prejudice the minds of the French against the state prisoners; to cover the murder of the duke d'Enghien, who had been barbarously put to death; and to furnish Bonaparte with a pretext to insist on those courts that were in his power to dismiss our ministers from them, where they maintained the dignity of the sovereign they represented; and when the trial of general Pichegru was daily expected, it was announced that he had hung himself in prison (t).

A letter was received on the 10th of April at the admiralty, from rear admiral Thornborough, enclosing one to him from captain Hardinge, of his majesty's sloop the Scorpion, in which he reported the successful issue of a most gallant and spirited attack which was made by captains Hardinge and Pelly, with the boats of the Scorpion and Beaver, on the Dutch national brig Atalante (u), commanded by captain Carp, at anchor within the Vlie roads, on the 31st of March preceding. Captain Hardinge, after detailing the particulars of the engagement, which was obstinate, states, that the captain of the Atalante refused quarter, when most generously offered him, and fell in defence of his brig.

In the house of commons, the Volunteer Bill was recommitted, and several amendments were adopted, among which was one for altering an insertion in one of the exemption clauses to twenty-four days service within the year, instead of stating the periods.

Mr. Crevey moved for papers relative to the proceedings in Ceylon, with a view to ground an enquiry into what took place in that island. He made some observations on the affairs of that colony from the year 1795 to the present time. He condemned the object which gave rise to the war then raging in that country, and adverted to the government of that island, which he condemned as inefficient. He alluded to the impolicy of sending our small force to a distance in the woody and mountainous interior, where their numbers were greatly diminished by the unhealthiness of the climate; and censured them for intriguing at the court of Candi, and dethroning the legal monarch, instead of recalling and concentrating our troops. He also asserted, that the number of exasperated Candians, who surrounded and massacred our force, was upwards of ten thousand. Adverting to the project of sending out two regiments, he asked if the house would admit of such a measure, without enquiring into the object of their service; and advised them to look to the example of the Dutch, who, in 1764, had penetrated and taken Candi twice.

Lord Castlereagh acknowledged that the house had a right to every information on the subject, but the production of the papers would only expose the weakness of the garrison in the island. As this was the case, he should move the previous question, which was carried by a majority of twenty-three.

Mr. Pitt brought forward two motions on the naval defence of the country, under the impression that no objection would be made to the information he wished to obtain. His first motion was, for an account, shewing the number of ships of the line, fifty gun ships, frigates, sloops, gun boats, bomb ships, hired armed sloops, and cutters, in commission, from the 1st of September, 1793, to the 1st of September, 1801, and from the year 1801, to the 1st of September, 1803, distinguishing how many armed sloops and floating batteries. His second motion was to ascertain whether the encrease of gun boats had not been attempted till 1804; and he contrasted this delay with the activity displayed at three periods of the last war, 1794, 1797, and 1801, when a very considerable number of gun boats had been built in less than ten weeks. The next point was to enquire how far our naval force would require new ships, supposing the war to be of considerable duration; and then he took a view of the number of seamen and marines in the beginning of the last war, when sixteen thousand had been augmented to eighteen thousand, and the number encreased in the first year to seventy-six thousand; while in the present war we started with a peace establishment of fifty thousand, to which only thirty-six thousand had been added; which shewed that in the first instance the number had been encreased five fold, while in the latter it had not been doubled.

After a few observations from sir C. Pole, admiral Berkeley, Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Fox, Mr. Addington, and captain Markham, the house divided, when there were, for the motion one hundred and thirty, against it two hundred and one; majority seventy-one.

The Volunteer Regulation Bill having passed the house of commons, in which it was debated in every stage, was read a first time in the house of lords, with a few observations, which chiefly turned on the importance of the measure, and the necessity of discussing it with temper.

On the order of the day for the second reading of this bill, lord Hawkesbury remarked, that there were at the time he was addressing the house, one hundred and eighty thousand regular troops in the united kingdom. The volunteer force, however, for general service, though it might be inferior to this, was, he contended, in some points of view, more efficacious than any other species of defensive force: it was intended, he said, to act, in general, as a subsidiary body. But as the principal parts of the debate which took place on the present occasion have been already detailed, there is no necessity for repeating them. Suffice it to say, that after considerable speeches from the earl of Caernarvon, lord Ellenborough, lord King, lord Boringdon, the bishop of Llandaff, lord Romney, lord Grenville, the Lord Chancellor, lord Spencer, and lord Auckland, the bill was read a second time.

On Wednesday, the 28th of March, lord Hawkesbury moved that his majesty's message respecting the Irish militia be taken into consideration. His lordship said, the address would not tend to pledge the house to the adoption of any specific measure; but merely general expressions of their willingness to concur in enabling his majesty to avail himself of the offers made by several regiments of the Irish militia. The voluntary coming forward of these troops in so laudable and patriotic a manner, was following up the auspicious measure of the union, in a most important and striking instance, and tending to identify the interests, the happiness, and prosperity of both parts of the united kingdom. His lordship then moved an address in the general terms which he had stated. This address occasioned a considerable debate, in which the duke of Montrose, the marquis of Sligo, the earl of Limeric, lord Grenville, lord Hobart, and lord Darnley, took a decided part, and the motion was adopted nem. diss.

A letter received from admiral Ranier, dated Bombay,

(t) The particulars of the death of this unfortunate man are too interesting to be passed over in silence. The following is the account as it appeared in the French papers: "The ex-general, Charles Pichegru, having repeatedly requested, and having given his word of honour that he would make no attempt on his life, Pichegru had obtained the dismission of his guards during the night. Every morning an attendant in waiting came to light his fire with a bundle of wood. Pichegru, on one of the preceding mornings, had laid aside a part of a faggot, by which he thought he might put an end to his existence. In short, on the 5th inst. (April) after having supped very heartily at eleven o'clock, he went to bed about twelve. The attendant in waiting having retired, Pichegru drew from under his pillow, where he had placed it, a black silk handkerchief, which he tied round his neck. The piece of wood which he had kept in reserve, he then made use of to assist him in the project of suicide. He introduced this piece of wood into the two ends of the handkerchief where it was tied; he turned this little stick close into the glands of the neck, as often as he thought necessary to put a stop to respiration. When on the point of losing respiration, he drew the stick behind his ear, and threw himself on the same side of his head, in order to prevent its shifting. Pichegru, naturally fat, full of blood, suffocated by the full meal which he had just taken, and the great pressure which he made, expired during the night.

Next day, in the morning, the attendant came to kindle his fire; he looked towards Pichegru's bed, saw him, as he supposed, in a profound sleep, and retired to do his other work. About half past seven, the attendant came again, saw the head of Pichegru quietly resting on his pillow, and again went away, still fearing to interrupt his sleep. At nine o'clock, he went up a third time; and observed no alteration in the posture of the prisoner, who usually spoke to him when he was awake. The attendant began to be surprized at his sleeping so long, went up to the bed, when he saw his face pale and distorted; he then moved the body, and found it lifeless and without motion. He immediately gave information to the gaoler, who went that instant to inform Thevenot, the judge, and solicitor in this important trial. Eight physicians and surgeons were employed to draw up the proces verbal of the state in which the body was found, and this proces verbal and the corpse, were brought before the criminal tribunal on the 6th, about one o'clock in the afternoon. The four sections of the tribunal immediately assembled, appointing eight physicians and surgeons to open, in the presence of four commissary judges, assisted by C. Lasfuterie, the body, and state the circumstances of his situation, and the cause of his death. An inquest was immediately held, which was followed by a judicial report of considerable length, stating that the corpse was the body of the ex-general Pichegru, and that he was guilty of suicide.

(u) The Atalante carried fifteen long twelve-pounders, and had on board seventy-six men. She was one of the largest brigs in the Dutch navy, and a remarkably fine vessel.

December 14, announced the capture of two Dutch ships, carrying six guns each, and three French ships, laden with merchandize and field artillery, ordnance, &c.

Letters from Jamaica confirmed the failure of the expedition against Curacoa; it was thought proper, however, to keep the island in a state of blockade, by the Blanche frigate, and two government schooners.

Several letters were received from commodore Hood, of his majesty's ship Centaur, our naval commander at the Windward Islands, in the West Indies. The first dated February 6, off Martinique, contained an account of a very gallant action performed by seventy-two seamen and marines belonging to the Centaur, under the command of lieutenant Reynolds, in four boats. They captured a French corvette, of sixteen long sixes, and one hundred men, lying in Fort Royal harbour, after a very spirited resistance. Every French officer but one, was either killed or wounded; and the captain (M. Cordier) who was among the latter, jumped overboard, and got on shore; our loss in killed and wounded was only three officers, and six men.

Lieutenant King, in the sloop Drake, carried Trinité, on the night of the 19th of February, with only thirty men, exposed to triple that force.

The elevation of the first consul to the imperial diadem is perhaps the most extraordinary event in the annals of modern Europe; an event that has involved, and appears likely to involve the most important consequences. And as we have hitherto noticed the means by which he ascended into the consular power, we deem it necessary to point out the manner in which he obtained the imperial crown. Many were of opinion that Bonaparte would be gratified with the high office of first consul, in which he was invested with all the authority of a crowned head; and which he exercised, but those who marked his ambition foresaw that he wished to render the sceptre of France hereditary in his family. The levity of the French character, their fondness for shew and novelty, were well known to Bonaparte, who saw that the time had now arrived when he could avail himself of the tide of popular opinion; which seemed to run entirely in his favour. His flatterers and dependents began to propagate the idea of the necessity of bringing back France again to a monarchical form of government; and that as the first consul had arrested the revolutionary system in its sanguinary career, he ought, as the reward of his services, to be called to the throne. The first hint of this kind in print appeared in the Moniteur of the 21st of April, 1804, in these words: "It is asserted that a deputation of the council of state will shortly present to the senate the new consultum, relative to an hereditary succession in the family of the first consul. The nation desires that solid system to be introduced for the public good, and this desire has been already expressed by several departments. The factious will thereby be deprived of every hope." This paragraph was immediately followed with a number of addresses, in which the inconveniencies attached to the elective system were deprecated, and a more stable form of government recommended. The council general of the department of Jura, at length ventured to speak out in bolder terms in their address to Bonaparte, which, amongst many other passages, contained the following: "The attack which threatened your life, has filled us with horror at the thoughts of the calamities into which all France was about to be plunged by a single crime. This attempt of our enemies is an important admonition which shall not have been given in vain. Those instigators of plots must be deprived of that chance of troubles and disorders which is the object of their hopes. Let a more stable order of things present to the friends of tranquillity a stronger security against all events. Let this order prevent for ever any vacancy in the supreme magistracy, by designing before hand, and in perpetuity, the successor to the head of the state. But, at the same time, let institutions equally strong and liberal, secure to our posterity a sufficient protection against the fluctuation and abuses of power. We address these our wishes with all frankness to Bonaparte; to his genius it belongs, by realizing them, to eternize his own work, and the happiness of France."

The grand question of the investiture of Bonaparte with the imperial purple was submitted to the opinion of the tribunate on the 1st of May, 1804. The debates on this momentous topic were so interesting, that we trust we shall be excused if we insert a few extracts from them. Fabre de l'Aude, the president, addressed the assembly as follows: "On the 23d of last month (April) our colleague Curée, laid on the table a motion of order, in which he demanded, 1st, That the government of the republic shall be confided to one emperor: 2d, That the empire shall be hereditary in the family of Napoleon Bonaparte, now first consul: 3d, That such of our instructions as are only traced out, shall be definitively suppressed. Curée, after a long introduction on the importance of the subject and the purity of his own patriotism, called the attention of the tribunes to the memorable epoch of the revolution, when the French with one unanimous will, and a voice as powerful as that of the Creator, the first day of the existence of the universe, exclaimed, "Let equality be established, let privileges disappear, and let the nation be as it ought to be." He then took a view of the government of Charlemagne, and the abuse introduced into France after that glorious epoch, when one of the most powerful families of the feudal system was called to the sovereignty. Having then made some observations on the constituent assembly, and the constitution of 1791, and the state of things down to the time in which he was speaking, he observed that the happy situation of the French people, who were then in the full possession of all the rights which were the sole objects of the revolution in 1789, was disturbed only by uncertainty in regard to the future. "The enemies of our country," said he, "are alarmed at our prosperity; their plots have been multiplied, and one might say, that instead of a whole nation, they had to combat only one man. Him they have attempted to strike, in order to effect his destruction, being well assured that France, deprived of its chief, would be divided by ambitious rivals, and torn by parties; would sink amidst the storms let loose against it in every direction. What security can we give it against the fear of so many misfortunes? What remedy can we oppose to so many evils? Opinion.—The armies, and the whole people have pronounced it:—Hereditary succession in a family rendered illustrious by the revolution, consecrated by liberty and equality; in the family of a chief, who was the first soldier of the republic before he became the first magistrate; a chief who would have been eminently distinguished by his civil qualities, even if he had not filled the whole world with the fame of his arms, and by the splendour of his victories." He concluded by saying, "I do not find any title for the chief of the national power, more worthy of the splendor of the nation than the title of Emperor. I move then, that we refer to the senate a wish, which is that of the whole nation, and of which the object is—1st. That Napoleon Bonaparte, now first consul, be declared Emperor, and in that quality remain charged with the government of the French republic. 2d, That the imperial dignity be declared hereditary in his family. 3d, That such of our institutions as are only traced out shall be definitively suspended."

A debate of considerable length ensued, in which Carnot was the only member that opposed the motion; and it was at last decreed as follows:

"The tribunate, considering that at the breaking out of the revolution, when the national will had an opportunity of manifesting itself with the greatest freedom, the general wish was declared for the individual unity of the supreme power, and for the hereditary succession of that power.

"That the family of the Bourbons, having by their conduct rendered the hereditary government odious to the people, forced them to lose sight of its advantages, and drove the nation to seek for a happier destiny in a democratical form of government.

"That France having made a trial of different forms of government, experienced from those trials only the miseries of anarchy.

"That the state was in the greatest peril, when Bonaparte, brought back by Providence, suddenly appeared for its salvation.

"That, under the government of a single individual, France recovered tranquillity at home, and acquired abroad the highest degree of consideration and glory.

"That the plots formed by the house of Bourbon, in concert with a ministry, the implacable enemy of France, warned France of the dangers which threatens it, if, losing Bonaparte, she continued exposed to the agitation inseparable from election.

"That the consulship for life, and the power granted to the first consul, of appointing his successor, are not adequate to the preventing intrigues at home or abroad, which could not fail to be formed during the vacancy of the supreme power.

"That, in declaring that magistracy hereditary, conformity mity is observed at once to the practice of all great states, ancient or modern; and to the first wish of the nation, expressed in 1789.

"That, enlightened and supported by this experience, the nation now returns to this wish, more strongly than ever, and expresses it on all sides.

"That in all political changes it has been usual for nations to confer the supreme power on those to whom they owe their safety.

"That when France demands for her security an hereditary chief, her gratitude and affections call on Bonaparte.

"That France will preserve all the advantages of the revolution by the choice of a new dynasty, as much interested for their safety as the old one would be for their destruction.

"That France may expect from the family of Bonaparte, more than from any other, the maintenance of the rights and liberties of the people who chose them, and all those institutions best calculated to support them.

"That there is no title more suitable to the glory of Bonaparte, and to the dignity of the supreme chief of the French nation, than the title of Emperor.

"The tribunate, exercising the right given them by the 29th article of the constitution, have come to the following vote:

"That Napoleon Bonaparte, the first consul, be proclaimed Emperor of the French, and in that capacity invested with the government of the French republic.

"That the title of Emperor, and the Imperial power, be made hereditary in his family in the male line, according to the order of primogeniture.

"That in introducing into the organization of the constituted authorities the modification rendered necessary by the establishment of hereditary power, the equality, the liberty, and the rights of the people, shall be preserved in all their integrity."

The foregoing decree having been put to the vote by the president of the tribunate, it was carried by acclamation, with the single exception of Carnot, as above mentioned.

As it is unnecessary to give the speeches of the several members on this important occasion, we shall come at once to the adoption of the above degree, by which Napoleon Bonaparte was elected Emperor of the French.

On the 19th of May, the Senatus Consultum of France finally adopted the decree for conferring the imperial dignity on Napoleon Bonaparte. The senate, accompanied by several bodies, repaired to the palace of St. Cloud, and being admitted to an audience of the newly created emperor, the consul Cambaceres, after a long address, presented the act of the Senatus Consultum. This act contained one hundred and forty-three articles. The laws are to be in future thus prefaced: "Napoleon, by the grace of God, and the constitution of the Republic, Emperor of the French," &c. &c.

On the 29th of the same month, general Moreau and other state prisoners were put on their trials; and nearly the whole of the first day was occupied in reading the act of accusation, which assumed, 1st, That the conspiracy was indisputably proved; 2nd, That the English government was the promoter of it; and, 3d, That all the individuals confined in virtue of the different mandates of arrest, were authors or accomplices in the conspiracy, or guilty of infringing the law relative to conspirators (x). The trial of Moreau was conducted with great acrimony, and when the witnesses on the part of the prosecution had been examined, Burnet, counsel for Moreau, recapitulated, seriatim, the whole of the evidence, in order to weaken the testimony of the witnesses, to point out their contradictions, and the little credit that ought to be given to men of such abandoned characters; they being mostly approvers to save their own lives. He then spoke for three hours in defence of his client. His speech, in which eloquence and argument were well combined, drew tears from almost every one who heard him. Having concluded, the general was called upon for his defence, which he delivered in a very impressive manner, without the least hesitation, in a manly tone of voice, and with an air that arrested the attention of the court. At length, the grand judge, having summed up the evidence, pronounced sentence of death on the general Moreau, which was afterwards commuted for banishment to America, whither he repaired.

The hopes which were entertained by the English, that our victories in the East Indies, though purchased at the expence of much blood and treasure, would ultimately lead to an honourable and permanent peace, were in some measure gratified by the ratification of two treaties, one with the rajah of Berar, and the other with Scindia, two of the most warlike and potent princes of Hindostan.

The capture of Surinam by the English was announced in the Gazette of June 22. This valuable acquisition was made with very little loss on the part of his majesty's troops. In the articles of capitulation it was stipulated that all the ships in the service of the colony, with a few exceptions should be delivered up.

And in the West Indies, the squadron under the command of admiral Duckworth, was extremely active in picking up several of the most desperate of the French privateers in that quarter, great numbers of which were enumerated in the Gazettes of this period.

In the house of commons the chancellor of the Exchequer moved to refer the papers relative to lord Hood's claims concerning the captures at Toulon, to a committee of supply, and stated the grounds on which these claims were preferred. The value of the ships brought away from Toulon, and afterwards employed in his majesty's service, was estimated at two hundred and thirty-six thousand seven hundred and forty-two pounds, and the value of the ordnance at twenty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-four pounds. The motion was agreed to, and the money granted.

Mr. Secretary Yorke moved the consideration of his majesty's message relative to the offers made by several regiments of Irish militia to extend their services to England. This motion called forth the talents of several members, and was at last carried. And in the course of a few days, the secretary at war, brought in a bill to empower his majecty to accept of the voluntary offer of the service of the Irish militia in England. This bill occasioned a great deal of debate, particularly on the third reading, which was carried by a majority of fifty-eight.

Intelligence was received about this time from Botany Bay, which mentioned that the prisoners at labour at Castle Hill, and the settlers' men, were in a state of insurrection, and that they had committed several outrages; but the affair was happily suppressed. The ring-leaders were taken and afterwards executed.

On the 8th of August, intelligence was received at the India House from captain Dance of the East India Company's ship Earl Camden, which gave an account of one of the most brilliant naval actions upon record. This action happened in the Eastern seas between the Company's ships and a squadron of French men of war under the command of admiral Linois, who was beat off. It appeared that of sixteen Indiamen, only three were really in action, and three more, which fired at some distance during the engagement: these were opposed to the whole French line, and the greatest number of hands on board any one of them amounted but to one hundred and thirty-five! In the chase but two of the British ships fired; and so great was the confusion of the enemy, that they never so much as fired one stern chaser. The English fleet was deeply laden; and admiral Linois' ship carried eighty guns! The value of our fleet, which was one of the richest that ever sailed from China, being sixteen ships, the smallest of one thousand eight hundred tons, was estimated at eight millions sterling, independent of the country ships, which might be estimated at two millions more, many having large quantities of specie on board. The praiseworthy gallantry of the British officers and seamen was handsomely rewarded by the court of directors, who presented captain Dance with two thousand guineas and a piece of plate of the value of two hundred guineas. The other captains and officers they likewise liberally rewarded; and to each seaman, ordinary seaman, and servant they gave six pounds.

The public mind experienced a great sensation by an account which was received of an engagement having taken place with a Spanish squadron on the 5th of October, England being at peace with Spain at the time. Four large Spanish frigates were discovered steering for Spain, the van ship carrying a broad pendant, and the ship next to her a rear-admiral's flag. Captain Gore's, the Medusa, being the headmost ship, placed himself on the weather boom of the Spanish commodore; the Indefatigable, captain Graham Moore, took a similar position along-side of (x) The object of the conspiracy was asserted to have been to place Louis XVIII. upon the throne, in which plan it was said that Moreau had promised to co-operate with Pichegru and Georges; and that he had consented to take a share in the restoration of royalty, but afterwards wavered in his opinion, and finally wished to erect himself into a dictator.

the rear-admiral; and the Amphion and Lively each took an opponent in the same manner as they came up. The Indefatigable fired a shot across the rear-admiral's fore foot, on which he shortened sail: lieutenant Ascot was then sent on board, to inform him, that captain Moore's orders were to detain the squadron, but that it was his wish to execute them without bloodshed, and that his determination must be made instantly. After waiting some time, a signal was made for the boat, and a shot was fired a-head of the admiral. As soon as the officer returned with an unsatisfactory answer, the action commenced; and in less than ten minutes La Mercedes, the admiral's second a-stern, blew up alongside the Amphion, with a tremendous explosion. The other three were taken (y). The Spanish fleet came from Monte Video, in the Rio de la Plata. The loss of men on both sides was but trifling.

About this time several martello towers were erected on the coast of Kent, particularly about Dover and its vicinity; and several batteries were likewise erected, to annoy the enemy in case of invasion being attempted. In Ireland also, the building of martello towers, for the protection of the coast from Bray to Dublin, was carried on with great activity.

In the West Indies, the Windward Islands suffered greatly by a hurricane of unexampled severity, which happened in the autumn of this year. St. Kitt's suffered mostly, every vessel there being utterly lost, to the number of one hundred and twenty. At Antigua fifty-eight vessels, besides the Cumberland packet, were cast away: at St. Bartholomew's fifty: at St. Thomas's forty-four, of which five were English. The loss fell chiefly among the American vessels. The dreadful effects of this hurricane was so extensive, that captain Counal, of the brig Agenora from Surinam and St. Thomas's to New York, stated that he was three days in sailing through pieces of the wrecks.

Accounts were received from Gibraltar that the Malaga fever had made its appearance, and continued to rage with uncommon rapidity; so that the deaths were averaged at ninety per diem, and on one day one hundred and fourteen were buried. From the strong approximation of the disease to the head, the faculty at first had recourse to bleeding, which generally proved fatal; as where it subdued the fever the patient often expired suddenly. The most successful mode of treatment at the commencement was a strong dose of glue and calomel combined with an equal quantity of jalap and rhubarb the instant the patient was attacked, to which the fever generally yielded in a few hours; and afterwards calomel with antimonials, administered in smaller quantities, rarely failed to complete a restoration of health. In pursuance of this plan, this dreadful pestilence was at length subdued, and every precaution taken to prevent the recurrence of it.

We have now to relate one of the most extraordinary events in the annals of history—the seizure of an ambassador, whose person in all ages was held inviolate. On the 25th of October, two hundred and fifty French troops commanded by general Frere, landed from three boats on the Hamburgh territory, and a part of the detachment, of about eighty men, went to Grendel, the country seat of sir George Rumbold, the British Chargé des Affaires for Hamburgh. Having heard a knock at the door, he got out of bed to inform himself of the cause, when he perceived the house was surrounded with soldiers, who instantly rushed in and took him prisoner. All his papers were seized, and sir George conveyed to Paris, where he was lodged as a prisoner in the Temple. The reason assigned by the French for his detention, was the machinations he was countenancing against the French government. Sir George was, however, not long detained in prison, but was released from his confinement, and on the 18th of November arrived in London.

The Romney of fifty guns, which sailed from Yarmouth, laden with bullocks, vegetables, &c. for the blockading fleet off the Texel, was totally lost on the 22d of November, on the south Haak sand, five miles west of the Texel; but by the humanity of the Dutch, who sent out five launches, the lives of three hundred British seamen were preserved.

Apprehensions having been entertained that hostilities with Spain were unavoidable, on the 27th of November, captain sir Richard Strachan, of the Donegal, took a large Spanish frigate off Cape St. Vincent, in which the Spanish captain was killed; and on the 29th, the British squadron on the same station, consisting of nine sail of the line, captured ten vessels whose cargoes were estimated at one hundred and fifty thousand pounds. The capture of these, and four register ships on the 5th of October, abovementioned, caused a great sensation in the heart of Spain. On the 14th of December, the king of Spain published a manifesto, which no doubt was manufactured in the cabinet at St. Cloud, in which he speaks of his great moderation, and of his intention to have remained neutral during the war; making no hesitation to assert, that he should quickly have the satisfaction of seeing that these ingenuous assurances were well received by the court of London. "Nevertheless," says the manifesto, "that cabinet, (St. James's,) which must have resolved in silence beforehand, and for its own particular ends, upon the renovation of war with Spain, and which it was always able to declare, not with the forms and solemnities prescribed by the law of nations, but by means of positive aggressions, which should turn to its own profit, sought the most frivolous pretext to bring into doubt the conduct of Spain, which was truly neutral, and to give demonstrations at the same time, to the desires of his Britannic majesty, to preserve the peace, all with the intention of gaining time, cajoling the Spanish government, and holding in uncertainty the opinion of the English nation upon its own premeditated and unjust designs, which could in no manner be approved by it." The manifesto continues some length; and the king of Spain proceeds to state, that he did not doubt "that all his subjects, inflamed with that just indignation with which the violent proceedings of England must inspire them, would not omit any of those means to which their valour should prompt them, of co-operating with his majesty towards the most complete vengeance for the insult of the Spanish flag!"

On the 7th of December, 1801, Mr. Wagstaff, the messenger, left London with dispatches for St. Petersburgh and Berlin. At Nahrdoff he was joined by a Hanoverian messenger who was travelling the same route. They arrived safely at Lubec, and proceeded through a wood, where they were beset by six men, who had lain in ambush, each of them armed with a carbine, who demanded their dispatches, which were delivered to them by the messengers; who were then tied to a tree, and left in that situation till they were enabled to relieve each other. It appeared that this transaction was planned by the French government, with a view of getting at the understanding which existed at that period between the courts of London and Petersburgh.

The third session of the second parliament of the United Kingdom was opened on the 15th of January, 1805, when his majesty went in his usual state to the house of lords, and delivered a speech from the throne; in which he noticed the conduct of the court of Spain, as being "evidently under the predominant influence and controul of France," which, he said, "compelled him to take prompt and decisive measures to guard against the effects of hostility." His majesty then observed, "The general conduct of the French government on the continent of Europe, has been marked by the utmost violence and outrage, and has shewn a wanton defiance of the rights of neutral territories, of the acknowledged privileges of accredited ministers, and of the established principles of the law of nations." His majesty then noticed, that overtures of a pacific nature had been made to him, but before he entered into any negociation on that subject, he thought it adviseable to consult the powers on the continent with whom he was on friendly terms.

The address, as usual was moved, seconded, and carried. The debates, however, though long, were not very interesting; similar topics having before been mentioned in our parliamentary departments, there is not the least necessity for repeating them.

On the 17th of January, a chapter of the knights of the (y) The following is a statement of the Spanish squadron: La Medée, (flag ship,) forty-two guns, eighteen pounders; La Fama, (commodore's ship,) thirty-six guns, twelve pounders; La Clara, thirty-six guns, twelve pounders; and La Mercedes, thirty-six guns, twelve pounders.—On account of the king, the amount of their lading was, seventy-five sacks of Vidona wool, sixty chests and sacks of cascarilla, four thousand seven hundred and thirty-two bars of tin, one thousand seven hundred and thirty-five pigs of copper, twenty-eight planks of wood, and one million three hundred and seven thousand six hundred and thirty-four dollars in silver. On account of the merchants, thirty-two chests of ratinia, one million eight hundred and fifty-nine thousand two hundred and sixteen dollars in silver, one million one hundred and nineteen thousand six hundred and fifty-eight gold, reduced into dollars, and one hundred and fifty thousand and eleven ingots of gold, reduced into dollars. And, on account of the marine company, twenty-six thousand nine hundred and twenty-five seal skins, and ten pipes of sea oil.

Garter

Garter was held by his majesty at St. James's, for the purpose of creating five new knights: these were, the duke of Beaufort, the marquis of Abercorn, the earl of Pembroke, the earl of Winchelsea, and the earl of Chesterfield. The bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Douglas, being much indisposed, the bishop of Norwich acted for him as chancellor of the order.

In the administration of Mr. Addington, a bill was enacted, empowering certain commissioners to make enquiry into naval abuses, and to report the same to the admiralty. The commissioners in progress of their investigations made a report respecting some repairs made to the ships Romney and Sensible, under the command of sir Home Popham: accordingly, on the 31st of January, Mr. Kinnaird moved in the house of commons, for the production of this paper; adding, that he should feel it his duty, if circumstances appeared to warrant it, to propose to the house a prosecution of the enquiry to which that report alluded. On the 5th of February, therefore, he made his promised motion, for the production of the papers relative to the repairs of the ships under the command of sir Home Popham. The motion was agreed to.

On the 8th of February, sir Evan Nepean moved for leave to bring in a bill for suspending the operation of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. To which sir John Newport moved an amendment, specifying that a committee be appointed by ballot to examine such documents as may be laid before them, and give their opinion whether the present circumstances of the country demanded such a measure. The motion of sir Evan Nepean occasioned a considerable debate, and the house divided on the amendment of sir John Newport, when there appeared, ayes thirty-three, noes one hundred and twelve; majority seventy-nine for the original motion.

On the 14th, sir Evan Nepean moved the second reading of the bill, which being done, a debate ensued, and the bill was then ordered to be committed. On the 19th, it was read a third time in the lower house, passed, and ordered to be carried to the lords; where it passed on the 21st, and the following day received the royal assent.

We have to record the melancholy accident of the loss of the Doris frigate, captain Campbell, on the night of the 12th of January. The Doris was proceeding to Quiberon Bay, through the Benequet Passage, when she struck on a sunken rock, called "The Diamond Rock," and in consequence made so much water, that all her guns and every weighty article were obliged to be thrown overboard. The weather moderating, they gained upon the leak, and in the evening she sailed for England with a fair breeze. In the night, however, it blew hard, with a heavy sea, and the water gushed in with such violence, that every exertion to keep it under proved ineffectual. In this situation, the captain finding it impossible to keep her above water, determined to abandon her, and bring her to anchor. A Danish brig was drifted in by the tide, and part of the crew were put on board her, with orders to proceed for England; the rest, including the captain and most of the officers, in all one hundred and seventeen, got on board the Felix. Captain Campbell then set the Doris on fire; in a short time the magazine blew up, and the ship immediately sunk.

But the loss of the Abergavenny East Indiaman was by far more disastrous. On the 1st of February, this fine vessel, under the command of captain Wordsworth, sailed from Portsmouth, in company with four others, under the convoy of the Weymouth frigate. The weather proving very unfavourable after their sailing, and the wind strongly adverse, induced them to steer for Portland Roads. When the Abergavenny struck on the shambles of the Bill of Portland, about two miles from the shore, it was the opinion of captain Wordsworth and his officers that the ship might be got off without sustaining much damage, and accordingly no signal guns of distress were fired for upwards of an hour and a half. The people were free from alarm, and lulled into a false security. They had even omitted to hoist out the boats, that they might be in readiness to take the crew on shore, in case of necessity. At four P. M. the aspect became dark and gloomy, and ideas of approaching danger alarmed the ship's company. The pumps were all set a-going, but the water gained upon them. At six P. M. the loss of the ship appeared inevitable; yet the captain and officers were firm, cool, and deliberate, giving their orders with promptitude, and supporting due subordination. As night advanced, the situation of all on board became terrible. At seven, Mr. Mortimer, the purser, was dispatched in one of the ship's boats with all the papers and dispatches: he was accompanied by the third mate, a cousin of the captain. One boat went from the shore, and brought away most of the ladies. About nine several boats were heard about the ship; but they rendered no assistance to the distressed on board, on what account has never been ascertained. The dreadful crisis was now approaching; and every one on board was assured of his fate. At ten o'clock, the ship began to sink, and, as she went down, confusion began to prevail. When the passengers and crew were acquainted with their situation they made several efforts to save their lives; some laid hold of pieces of the wreck, and committed themselves to the mercy of the waves; a great number ran up the shrouds; and about eleven o'clock, a heavy sea gave the vessel a sudden shock, and in an instant she sunk twelve fathoms in water. Many of the unfortunate persons who had run up the shrouds for safety were unable to sustain the motion of the vessel in going down, and suffered with their unhappy companions below. Between eighty and ninety persons, however, were still able to maintain their situation, and were ultimately saved. She had seventy thousand pounds in specie on board: the crew consisted of one hundred and sixty men, and there were between fifty and sixty passengers: the rest were recruits for his majesty's service: about thirty Chinamen were also on board. The number lost was estimated at three hundred. Captain Wordsworth was among the lost.

On the 31st of January, the London Docks were opened for the reception of vessels.

The vacancy in the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury was filled up in February, by the elevation of Dr. Charles Manners Sutton to the primacy.

The imperial diadem which had been placed on the head of Bonaparte does not appear to have been sufficient to satisfy his ambition; he wished to augment the list of his titles, by adding another kingdom to his sovereignty. Accordingly, on the 17th of March, his imperial majesty being seated on the throne, surrounded by the grand dignitaries, the ministers and great officers, and members of the council of state; the grand master of the ceremonies introduced M. Melzi, vice-president of the Italian republic. M. Melzi addressed the emperor in a speech, in which he declared the resolutions of the Italian consulta to be, "That the emperor Napoleon, founder of the Italian republic, be declared king of Italy; that the throne of Italy be hereditary from male to male, to the perpetual exclusion of females and their issue," &c.

On the 25th of March, in the house of lords, lord Grenville presented a petition from a number of Roman Catholic noblemen and gentlemen of different parts of the United Kingdom, praying to be relieved from various disqualifications under which they laboured. The petition was ordered to lie on the table. The same day Mr. Fox, in the house of commons, presented a petition from the Roman Catholics of Ireland, which was likewise ordered to lie on the table. We forbear to make any remarks upon the subject of the catholic question at present, because we shall have occasion to mention it in a future page of our history.

During the administration of Mr. Addington, certain commissioners were appointed to enquire into enormous and flagrant abuses which had been discovered in the department of the navy. The commissioners executed their trust with circumspection and diligence, and from time to time they made reports of their proceedings to parliament; but their tenth report was of such a nature as to attract universal attention. Upon examination of the accounts of the late treasurer of the navy, lord Melville, (then Mr. Dundas,) it was discovered that his lordship had drawn large sums of money from the Bank, through the agency of Alexander Trotter, Esq. pay-master. Lord Melville had been twice treasurer of the navy. In 1785 an act was passed "for better regulating the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy;" which enacted that all monies issued for naval services should be paid to the bank, and should not be withdrawn unless for naval services. Lord Melville was the person who brought forward this bill for the regulation of the office; and he it appeared was the first charged with infringing the statute. Upon discovery of the proceedings of lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, the commissioners addressed a letter to him for information on the subject; to which his lordship did not afford the commissioners a satisfactory answer. The subject was brought before parliament; and on the 8th of April, Mr. Whitbread moved various resolutions against his lordship. With respect to Mr.

Mr. Trotter, the honourable member said, there was no occasion for making any distinction; for that, in this business, he and lord Melville were identified with each other; they were, indeed, one and the same. Mr. Whitbread closed a luminous and eloquent speech by moving thirteen resolutions; the eleventh and thirteenth of which were, "That the right honourable viscount Melville having been privy to, and connived at, the withdrawing from the bank of England, for purposes of private interest or emolument, sums issued to him as treasurer of the navy, and placed on his account in the bank, according to the provisions of the 25th Geo. III. c. 31. has been guilty of a gross violation of the law, and a high breach of duty;" and "That lord Melville, in applying monies issued for the service of the navy to other services, stated to have been of so delicate and confidential a nature, that in his opinion no account can or ought to be given of them, has acted in a manner inconsistent with his duty, and incompatible with those securities which the legislature has provided for the proper application of the public money." After a great deal had been said on the subject, in which Mr. Pitt, lord Henry Petty, the Attorney General, Mr. Tierney, Mr. Wilberforce, sir Charles Price, and lord Archibald Hamilton, took a leading part, the house divided, when there appeared ayes two hundred and sixteen, noes two hundred and sixteen. The numbers being thus equal, the right honourable Charles Abbot, the speaker, gave the casting vote in a most solemn manner against lord Melville (z).

It is impossible for words to describe the general satisfaction which pervaded the nation in consequence of this termination of so important a question. The exalted rank; the supposed integrity of the nobleman, who had so long been a star of magnitude in the political world; his long established friendship with the premier; the places he had possessed; the situation he now held as first lord of the admiralty, rendered the circumstance of his supposed delinquency in the office of treasurer of the navy, more notorious. Yet many who were not his partizans, who disapproved of his political system, but admired his talents, were not suspicious of his integrity until the tenth report of the commissioners of naval enquiry unfolded and developed such a series of transactions, that "appeared pregnant with guilt," so as to astonish and excite the indignation not only of those persons, but of the public in general.

On the 10th of April, the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the house that lord viscount Melville, in consequence of the proceedings which had taken place in that house two nights ago, had sent in his resignation of the office he held as first lord of the admiralty, and that his majesty had been graciously pleased to receive the same.

Mr. Whitbread then moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to remove lord Melville from all the offices held by him under the crown, and from his majesty's councils and presence for ever."

A great deal of debate took place on this motion, which the honourable member at length withdrew, but substituted in its place the following: "That the resolutions passed by the house be laid at the foot of the throne." This was unanimously agreed to. He then moved, "That the whole house do wait upon his majesty with those resolutions." This motion was also carried.

The next day, April 11, the resolutions were presented to his majesty at St. James's, by the speaker and a great number of the members: they were most graciously received by his majesty, who thanked them for their care and attention to the public interest.

Numerous debates took place on this important business on the 25th and 29th of the same month. On the 25th, Mr. Grey complained in the house of a scandalous and insulting libel contained in a newspaper (The Oracle) of that day, a part of which he read, the purport of which was, that "lord Melville had been condemned without a trial." Mr. Grey then moved, "That Peter Stuart, the proprietor and publisher of the Oracle, should attend the house on the next day." This motion was carried; and the next day Mr. Stuart being ordered to the bar, was shewn the paper containing the offensive passage, which he acknowledged as having printed and published. He then addressed the speaker, in which he said, that he very much regretted that any part of the contents of his paper should have incurred the displeasure of the honourable house; and that he had no wilful intention to provoke the censure of a power on which our dearest rights and interests depend. He was then ordered into the custody of the serjeant at arms, and on the ensuing day brought to the bar, where he was reprimanded by the speaker, and discharged.

The house of commons having passed a vote of censure on lord Melville, occasioned a considerable degree of public discussion. General meetings were called throughout the kingdom, to express their sentiments on this subject; of which the city of London took the lead, and presented an address to his majesty on the 1st of May (a).

On the 13th of May, the catholic petition was again agitated, when a considerable debate took place. On the division, there appeared, ayes one hundred and twenty-four; noes three hundred and thirty-six: it was therefore lost by a majority of two hundred and twelve. The debate on the catholic petition likewise occupied two days in the house of peers; and on the division there appeared, in support of it forty-nine, and against it one hundred and seventy-eight; majority one hundred and twenty-nine.

Among the institutions of the present year, we must mention that of the honourable East India Company; who established at Hertford a seminary or college for the instruction of such young men as may be employed in various civil capacities in their service in India. The Rev. Mr. Henley was appointed president of the college. The education is to be commercial and classical, and to comprize, among other branches of instruction, the mathematics, geography, modern languages, and Oriental literature.

On the 26th of May, Mr. Whitbread, attended by a number of members, went to the bar of the house of lords, and delivered a message to their lordships in the following terms:

"My Lords,

"The commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in parliament assembled, have commanded me to impeach Henry lord viscount Melville of high crimes and misdemeanours; and I do here, in their name, and in the name of all the commons of the said United Kingdom, impeach the said lord viscount Melville of high crimes and misdemeanours. I am further commanded to acquaint your lordships, that the house of commons will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, Henry lord viscount Melville, and will make good the same."

The 11th of June being the day appointed for Mr. Whitbread to move the impeachment against lord viscount Melville, the speaker informed the house, that he had just received a letter, signed "Melville," dated Wimbledon, June 11, which being read,

"Mr. R. Dundas moved, "That lord viscount Melville be now admitted, and heard;" which being unanimously agreed to, the speaker ordered the serjeant to take the mace, and acquaint lord viscount Melville that he may come in (b).

(z) The place where the members of the house of commons meet was formerly the chapel of St. Stephen, and this laudable conduct of the speaker gave rise to a popular toast at this period—"The Abbot of St. Stephen."

(a) It may be observed, that the clerks of Messrs. Coutts, bankers, on their examination before the commissioners, deposed, that the monies held by the banking house in the name of Trotter were appropriated to the purpose of discounting private bills, and buying stock on account of Mr. Trotter.

In 1791, by the accounts of Messrs. Coutts, the whole of the dividends on Mr. Trotter's property amounted to eighty pounds per annum; in 1792, to two hundred pounds; in 1793, to four hundred and seventy pounds ten shillings; in 1794, to five hundred and fifty-six pounds eight shillings; in 1796, to have increased to two thousand pounds three shillings; in 1797, to four thousand and sixty-two pounds seventeen shillings; in 1801, to six thousand eight hundred and sixteen pounds thirteen shillings and three pence; and in 1802, to eleven thousand three hundred and sixty-eight pounds one shilling.

Mr. Trotter's funded property, at the close of the account, appears to have consisted of, fifty-three thousand two hundred and twenty-one pounds thirteen shillings and four pence Consols. Seventeen thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight pounds seven shillings, India stock. Two thousand one hundred and forty-two pounds seventeen shillings and two pence, Bank stock. Forty-four thousand pounds, Reduced three per cents. One hundred and thirty thousand and five pounds, Four per cents. One thousand five hundred pounds per annum Imp. ann.

Mr. Trotter's SALARY was only eight hundred pounds per annum!!!

(b) The ceremony of admitting a peer to defend himself in the house of commons, is thus stated in Hatsell's Book of Precedents:

"The peer is attended from the door of the house by the serjeant at arms, with the mace, making three obeisances to the house; a chair is set for him within the bar, on the left hand, as he enters, in which he sits down, covered, the speaker informing him that there is a chair for his lordship to repose himself in. When he rises to speak in his defence, he speaks uncovered. He may be admitted into the house as soon as the member who is to move the impeachment rises. When that member has finished his speech, the peer gets up, and after he has finished he withdraws, making the same obeisances to the house; the serjeant with the mace accompanying him to the door."

The

The serjeant accordingly introduced lord Melville in the customary manner, who was attended by his son and Mr. Charles Dundas. Having made his obeisance to the chair, the speaker informed his lordship, that there was a chair for him to repose in, if he thought fit. His lordship seated himself for about a minute, with his hat on, and then rose, uncovered, to address the house; which he did in a speech of considerable length, wherein he "denied any participation with Mr. Trotter in his supposed profits, by the application of public monies for private purposes." Upon the subject of ten thousand pounds, and other public monies received by him and not applied to naval purposes, but disbursed in the management of the affairs of Scotland, his lordship positively declared, that "private honour and personal convenience must prevent him from ever giving any account of them." Having concluded his harangue,

Mr. Whitbread replied, and said, that he meant to accuse his lordship upon three distinct heads: "first, that he had connived at a direct violation of the law, and thereby been guilty of a high breach of his duty; secondly, he should charge him with a participation of profits arising from the abuse of the public money; and, thirdly, that he procured under false pretences, certain sums of money from the public purse, for the application of which he could produce no voucher, the same being burnt and destroyed by express agreement and contrivance.

A long debate ensued, and it being three o'clock on the morning of the 12th, and not likely to come to a conclusion, the house adjourned till the afternoon, when the debate was resumed; and on the first division—for the impeachment of lord Melville, there appeared ayes one hundred and ninety-five, noes two hundred and seventy-two; majority against the impeachment seventy-seven!!! On a second division—for the criminal prosecution, the numbers were, ayes two hundred and thirty-eight; noes two hundred and twenty-nine; majority for the criminal prosecution nine.

The subject was again discussed in the house of commons on the 20th of June; and again on the 25th; when, on the motion of Mr. Leycester, the method of proceeding by impeachment was adopted in preference to that by criminal prosecution; and a committee was appointed to conduct it. On the 27th, a debate took place on a part of the commissioners' report; and on 28th, Mr. Whitbread obtained leave to bring in a bill for the indemnity of Mr. Trotter, &c.

On the 9th of July, Mr. Whitbread, accompanied by several members of the house of commons, presented articles of impeachment against lord Melville at the bar of the house of lords; which articles being read over by the clerk, it was ordered, on the motion of lord Hawkesbury, that a copy of them should, within one month, be delivered to lord Melville; and that he should be directed to give in an answer in writing to the said articles on the second day of the next session.

On the 11th of July, the house was occupied in passing the impeachment committee, and various other bills; and, on the following day, after a number of bills had received the royal assent, the lord Chancellor, in the name of his majesty, addressed both houses in a short speech, and the parliament was prorogued to the 22nd of August next.

In the court of King's Bench, Dublin, Mr. Hamilton Rowan was brought by writ of Habeas Corpus, on the 1st of July, when being put to plead to the indictment, which was for high treason, he pleaded his majesty's pardon, and was dismissed.

On the 23rd of July, sir Robert Calder, with fifteen sail of the line, two frigates, a cutter, and a lugger, fell in with the combined fleets of France and Spain, and a desperate action ensued, which lasted upwards of four hours, when he captured the San Raphael of eighty-four guns, and El Firme of seventy-four guns. A heavy fog continued nearly the whole time, and the rest of the combined fleet escaped. On board the English fleet were forty-one killed, and one hundred and fifty-eight wounded; but the loss on board the combined fleet could not be known.

About this period, an amazing progress was made in the propagation of Spanish sheep in this country; insomuch, that although that valuable breed had been so lately introduced, yet its good effects began to be already felt; and it was thought that if due attention were paid to the cultivation of that useful animal, we might, in the course of a few years, be entirely independent of Spain in our manufactures, for the greater part of that supply of wool which was formerly so indispensibly requisite.

At this time our West India merchants were considerably depressed, in consequence of the number of vessels taken by the enemy, fifteen of which were captured by the combined fleets of France and Spain. Admiral Villeneuve's letter to the minister of marine says, "Having doubled Antigua, I got intelligence of a convoy of the enemy, consisting of fifteen sail. I made signal for a general chase, and at night-fall the whole of the convoy was in my power, which I sent to Martinique. These ships, which had come out from Antigua, were all laden with colonial produce, and destined for Europe. The convoy may be valued at five millions (French.)"—About one million two hundred thousand pounds sterling.

A French force was stationed to annoy our West India commerce, which consisted of La Topaze, of forty-four guns; Le Departement des Landes, of twenty guns; La Torche, of eighteen guns; and Le Faune, of sixteen guns. Captain Zachariah Mudge, in the Blanche, made a spirited attack on that force; and his conduct, though his ship was lost, cannot be too highly spoken of. His own letter, addressed to William Marsden, Esq. secretary to the admiralty, and dated on board the French national ship La Topaze, July 22, shall describe the action (c).

The system of peculation carried on against the workmen in the king's dock yards, induced the admiralty to adopt measures for the relief of that useful body of men. From time immemorial it had been the practice to calculate the earnings of the artificers and other workmen in his majesty's dock-yards at the expiration of each quarter, and by the time the books were cast and properly adjusted, it was always near the end of the succeeding quarter before the payments could be made, so that the earnings of the men were always at least three months, and in part from four to six months, in arrears. The consequence was, the men were beholden entirely, for the subsistence of themselves and families, to a set of people called dealers, but who, in fact, were shop or tavern keepers, who supplied them with what they wanted, not in cash, but in different articles of provisions, liquors, or goods, at a deduction of from ten to fifteen per cent. from the amount of their earnings, which the note they got from the clerk of check's office stated to be due to the parties. Thus the workman was subjected to a deduction in the rate of his earnings of at least two shillings in the pound, and which they were endeavouring to raise to three, while he was frequently compelled to take all he wanted from one shop or tavern keeper, whether he dealt in that article or not, or procured it from another for the workman's use. This glaring evil is now, by the wisdom of the admiralty, at an end. On the first Saturday of October, a new mode of payment was adopted throughout all his majesty's dock-yards, by which each artificer and workman was paid in money from three-fourths to seven-eighths of the amount of his week's earnings, under the denomination of subsistence, while the remainder only went to account, to be calculated at the expiration of the quarter, under the denomination of arrears. It is lamentable, but not surprising, to observe the means which were resorted to by these dealers to render this very salutary measure objectionable to the parties: they threatened to cut off all temporary supplies in the interim, and had recourse to every means in their power to thwart the measure in its outset; but their efforts proved in vain, and this excellent regulation not only met with no obstruction, but was the mean of recalling numbers of those valuable workmen, who quitted the king's service for that of the merchant builders, from whom they received their wages in a manner certainly more suitable to the exigencies and wants of their families.

(c) "Sir, I am sorry to inform you of the loss of his majesty's ship Blanche, which was captured by a French squadron; but, thank God, she was not destined to bear French colours, or to assist the fleet of the enemy. On Friday morning, July 19, in latitude twenty degrees twenty minutes North, longitude sixty-six degrees forty-four minutes West, (weather hazy,) at eight, four sail were seen off the weather cat-head, three ships, and a brig on the opposite tack, under easy sail. I kept to the wind until we were near enough to distinguish colours. I then made the necessary signals to ascertain whether they were enemies. At ten, when a-breast, about three miles distant, they all bore up, and hoisted English ensigns; but, from the make of the union, and colour of the bunting, with other circumstances, I concluded they were French, and therefore determined to sell the ship as dearly as possible (for sailing was out of the question, the Blanche having little or no copper on these last nine months, and sailed very heavy). Having brought-to, with the mainsail in the brails, at eleven the commodore ranged up within two cables' length, shifted his colours, and gave us his broadside. When within pistol-shot she received ours; the action became warm and steady, the ships never without hail of each other, running large, under easy sail; le Departement des Landes on the starboard quarter, and the two corvettes close astern. At forty-five minutes past eleven the ship became ungovernable, and was reduced to a perfect wreck; the sails totally destroyed, ten shot in the foremast (expecting it to fall every minute), the mainmast and rigging cut to pieces, seven guns dismounted, and the crew reduced to one hundred and ninety, and the rest falling fast, with no probability of escape, I called a council of officers for their opinion, who deemed it only sacrificing the lives of the remainder of as brave a crew as ever fought, to hold out longer, as there was not the smallest prospect of success; I therefore, at twelve, ordered the colours to be struck, and was immediately hurried on board the commodore. At six, the officers, who had charge of the Blanche, returned, and reported the ship to be sinking fast, on which she was fired; and in about an hour after she sunk, for the magazine had been some time under water. Thus, Sir, fell the Blanche; and I trust the defence made by her officers and gallant crew will meet their lordships' approbation. I have the honour to be, &c. "ZACHARY MUDGE."

About the middle of October, Mr. Francis, the inventor of the catamarans, made an experiment on a brig opposite Walmer Castle. After walking some time on the water's edge, he tied a handkerchief to the end of his cane, and made a signal to a brig, which lay about half a mile from the shore, and instantly a long ten-oared galley darted by the bow of the brig, and threw the catamaran into the water. Mr, Francis then said, fifteen minutes is her time; accordingly in sixteen minutes the explosion took place. The brig appeared to be lifted out of the water, and heeling to larboard, she separated in the middle, when the two ends immediately went to the bottom; and in one minute nothing was to be seen of her but morsels of floating wreck.

We have now to record the account of one of the most brilliant victories over the French and Spanish combined fleets off Cape Trafalgar, in which we lost the gallant lord viscount Nelson. The following extracts from the letters of vice-admiral Collingwood will better describe the action than any abstract account. The letters are dated from on board the Euryalus, off Cape Trafalgar, October 22, 1805.

"The ever-to-be-lamented death of vice-admiral lord viscount Nelson (d), who in the late conflict with the enemy, fell in the hour of victory, leaves to me the duty of informing my lords commissioners of the admiralty, that on the 19th instant (October) it was communicated to the commander in chief from the ships watching the motions of the enemy in Cadiz, that the combined fleets had put to sea; as they sailed with light winds westerly, his lordship concluded their destination was the Mediterranean, and immediately made all sail for the Streights' entrance, with the British squadron, consisting of twenty-seven ships, three of them sixty-fours, where his lordship was informed by captain Blackwood, (whose vigilance in watching, and giving notice of the enemy's movements, has been highly meritorious,) that they had not yet passed the Streights.

"On Monday the 21st instant, at day-light, when Cape Trafalgar bore E. by S. about seven leagues, the enemy was discovered six or seven miles to the eastward, the wind about west, and very light; the commander in chief immediately made the signal for the fleet to bear up in two columns, as they are formed in order of sailing; a mode of attack his lordship had previously directed, to avoid the inconvenience and delay in forming a line of battle in the usual manner. The enemy's line consisted of thirty-three ships (of which eighteen were French and fifteen Spanish,) commanded in chief by admiral Villeneuve; the Spaniards, under the direction of Gravina, wore, with their heads to the northward, and formed their line of battle with great closeness and correctness; but as the mode of attack was unusual, so the structure of their line was new;—it formed a crescent convexing to leeward—so that, in leading down to their centre, I had both their van and rear abaft the beam: before the fire opened, every alternate ship was about a cable's length to windward of her second a-head and a-stern, forming a kind of double line, and appeared, when on their beam, to leave a very little interval between them; and this without crowding their ships. Admiral Villeneuve was in the Bucentaure in the centre, and the prince of Asturias bore Gravina's flag in the rear; but the French and Spanish ships were mixed without any apparent regard to order of national squadron.

"As the mode of our attack had been previously determined on, and communicated to the flag-officers and captains, few signals were necessary, and none were made, except to direct close order as the lines bore down.

"The commander in chief, in the Victory, led the weather column; and the Royal Sovereign, which bore my flag, the lee.

"The action began at twelve o'clock, by the leading ships of the columns breaking through the enemy's line, the commander in chief about the tenth ship from the van, the second in command about the twelfth from the rear, leaving the van of the enemy unoccupied; the succeeding ships breaking through in all parts, a-stern of their leaders, and engaging the enemy at the muzzles of their guns, the conflict was severe; the enemy's ships were fought with a gallantry highly honourable to their officers, but the attack on them was irresistible; and it pleased the Almighty Disposer of all events to grant his majesty's arms a complete and glorious victory. About three P. M. many of the enemy's ships having struck their colours, their line gave way; admiral Gravina, with ten ships, joining their frigates to leeward stood towards Cadiz. The five headmost ships in their van tacked, and standing to the southward, to windward of the British line, were engaged, and the sternmost of them taken; the others went off, leaving to his majesty's squadron nineteen ships of the line, (of which two are first rates, the Santissima Trinidada and the Santa Anna,) with three flag officers; viz. admiral Villeneuve, the commander in chief; Don Ignatio Maria d'Aliva, vice-admiral; and the Spanish rear-admiral, Don Balthazar Hidalgo Cisneros.

"The Royal Sovereign having lost her masts, except the tottering foremast, I called the Euryalus to me, while the action continued, which ship lying within hail, made my signals, a service captain Blackwood performed with great attention. After the action I shifted my flag to her, that I might more easily communicate my orders to, and collect the ships, and towed the Royal Sovereign out to seaward. The whole fleet were now in a very perilous situation; many dismasted; all shattered; in thirteen fathoms water, off the shoals of Trafalgar; and when I made the signal to prepare for anchor, few of the ships had an anchor to let go, their cables being shot; but the same

(d) Horatio, late lord viscount Nelson, was the third son of the Rev. Edmund Nelson, rector of Burnham Thorpe, in the county of Suffolk. He was born September 29, 1758, and received the first rudiments of his education in the public school of Norwich. In the year 1770, when only twelve years of age, he was entered on board the Raisonable, of sixty-four guns, under the command of captain Maurice Suckling, his maternal uncle. He was averse to the sea life at first, and captain Suckling had great difficulty in removing his prejudices; but this being effected, he behaved with the greatest intrepidity and courage; and, at length, after a series of amazing successes, he arrived at the head of his profession. We shall not enter into a particular account of the number of actions in which his lordship so eminently distinguished himself, but proceed to narrate the manner of his death and funeral. Lord Nelson is reported to have said to his friend admiral Stirling, just before he went upon the service which terminated so brilliantly for his own fame, and for that of his country, "My health is so bad, that I ought to retire; but as my generous countrymen seem to think that I could do something if I were to meet the enemy, I feel it to be a duty to do what I can. I shall therefore go, and hope I shall be able to meet and conquer them; and I shall think my life gloriously sacrificed in such a cause." The last order which his lordship gave before the action is a short, but comprehensive one, "England expects every man to do his duty." The first person that was killed near his lordship was Mr. Scott, his secretary. A musket-ball entered his head, and he fell dead instantly. Another shot, a few minutes after, struck his lordship, and, entering below his left shoulder, took a direction through the vital parts; he staggered against the officer who was next him, and was instantly carried below. This was about the middle of the action. The surgeons were employed upon the wounded: and his lordship, with his accustomed disinterestedness, desired that he might take his turn. As soon as the surgeon examined the wound, he perceived that it was mortal. The gallant hero had his eyes fixed attentively upon him; he saw the surgeon turn pale, and his countenance assume the deepest impression of grief. "Is it mortal?" said his lordship. The surgeon did not, or could not speak. Perceiving his hesitation, lord Nelson said, "Why, then, I will tell you it is! Do you not recollect some time ago, when we were talking of wounds, that you told me of a shot a man received in his breast, which you declared was mortal? I feel that I am precisely in the situation of that man; but GOD'S WILL BE DONE! If it had pleased the Almighty, I should have preferred dying on British ground." Having been placed on a chair, his lordship directed that captain Hardy might attend him, who remained with him till the last, and in a few moments his gallant soul escaped for ever.

Thus terminated the life of Horatio lord viscount Nelson! a life which, from the twelfth year of his age, had been indefatigably devoted to the public service. For variety of danger, and for splendour of success, the memoirs of his brilliant career are without parallel.

On Sunday, the 5th of January, 1806, the great hall of Greenwich Hospital was thrown open for the admission of the public to see the coffin which contains the body of lord Nelson; for it there lay in state in a magnificent manner; and on the 9th, the coffin was placed on a funeral car, supported on a platform, which was modelled at the ends in imitation of the hull of the Victory. An awning was placed over the whole: at one end was inscribed the word NILE, and behind the word TRAFALGAR. The procession advanced to St. Paul's cathedral, where the funeral service was performed, and the body interred.

So great was the respect for the memory of lord Nelson, that by a message from the crown in May, 1806, which was confirmed by parliament, earl Nelson and his heirs are to receive five thousand pounds per annum, and one hundred and twenty thousand pounds to purchase a family estate.

good

Corbould del

Published by J. Stratford 112 Holborn Hill March 27 1813.

Taylor sculp.

DEATH of LORD NELSON.

good Providence which aided us through such a day preserved us in the night, by the wind shifting a few points, and drifting the ships off the land, except four of the captured dismasted ships, which are now at anchor off Trafalgar, and I hope will ride safe until those gales are over."

From a letter, dated October 24. "On the 22d, in the morning, a strong southerly wind blew, with squally weather, which however did not prevent the activity of the officers and seamen of such ships as were manageable from getting hold of many of the prizes (thirteen or fourteen), and towing them off to the westward, where I ordered them to rendezvous round the Royal Sovereign, in tow by the Neptune: but on the 23d the gale increased, and the sea ran so high, that many of them broke the tow rope, and drifted far to leeward before they were got hold of again; and some of them taking advantage of the dark and boisterous night, got before the wind, and have perhaps drifted upon the shore and sunk; on the afternoon of that day the remnant of the combined fleet, ten sail of ships, who had not been much engaged, stood up to leeward of my shattered and straggled charge, as if meaning to attack them, which obliged me to collect a force out of the least injured ships, and form to leeward for their defence; all this retarded the progress of the hulks; and the bad weather continuing, determined me to destroy all the leewardmost that could be cleared of the men, considering that keeping possession of the ships was a matter of little consequence compared with the chance of their falling again into the hands of the enemy: but even this was an arduous task in the high sea which was running. I hope, however, it has been accomplished to a considerable extent; I entrusted it to skilful officers, who would spare no pains to execute what was possible. The captains of the Prince and Neptune cleared the Trinidada and sunk her. Captains Hope, Bayntun, and Malcolm, who joined the fleet this moment from Gibraltar, had the charge of destroying five others. The Redoubtable sunk a-stern of the Swiftsure while in tow. The Santa Anna, I have no doubt, is sunk, as her side was almost entirely beat in; and such is the shattered condition of the whole of them, that unless the weather moderates, I doubt whether I shall be able to carry a ship of them into port."

October 28, 1805.

"Since my letter to you of the 24th, stating the proceedings of his majesty's squadron, our situation has been the most critical, and our employment the most arduous, that ever a fleet was engaged in. On the 24th and 25th it blew a most violent gale of wind, which completely dispersed the ships, and drove the captured hulls in all directions.

"I have since been employed in collecting and destroying them, where they are at anchor upon the coast between Cadiz and six leagues westward of San Lucar, without the prospect of saving one to bring into port.

"On the return of Gravina to Cadiz he was immediately ordered to sea again, and came out, which made it necessary for me to form a line, to cover the disabled hulls—that night it blew hard, and his ship, the Prince of Asturias, was dismasted, and returned into port; the Rayo was also dismasted, and fell into our hands; Don Enrigue M'Donel had his broad pendant in the Rayo, and from him I find the Santa Anna was driven near Cadiz, and towed in by a frigate."

November 4, 1805.

"On the 28th ultimo I informed you of the proceedings of the squadron to that time. The weather continuing very bad, the wind blowing from the S. W. the squadron not in a situation of safety, and seeing little prospect of getting the captured ships off the land, and great risk of some of them getting into port, I determined no longer to delay the destroying them, and to get the squadron out of the deep bay.

"I informed you, in my letter of the 28th, that the remnant of the enemy's fleet came out a second time to endeavour, in the bad weather, to cut off some of the hulks, when the Rayo was dismasted, and fell into our hands; she afterwards parted her cable, went on shore, and was wrecked. The Indomptable, one of the same squadron, was also driven on shore, wrecked, and her crew perished.

"The Santa Anna and Algeziras being driven near the shore of Cadiz, got such assistance as has enabled them to get in; but the ruin of their fleet is as complete as could be expected, under the circumstances of fighting them close to their own shore. Twenty sail of the line are taken or destroyed; and of those which got in, not more than three are in a repairable state for a length of time.

"In clearing the captured ships of prisoners, I found so many wounded men, that to alleviate human misery as much as was in my power, I sent to the marquis de Solana, governor-general of Andalusia, to offer him the wounded to the care of their country, on receipts being given: a proposal which was received with the greatest thankfulness; not only by the governor, but the whole country resounds with expressions of gratitude. Two French frigates were sent out to receive them, with a proper officer to give receipts, bringing with them all the English who had been wrecked in several of their ships, and an offer from the marquis de Solana of the use of their hospitals for our wounded, pledging the honour of Spain for their being carefully attended.

"I have ordered most of the Spanish prisoners to be released, the officers on parole; the men for receipts given, and a condition that they do not serve in war, by sea or land, until exchanged (e).

"I am, &c.

"C. Collingwood."

Thus have we given a faithful description of the battle off Trafalgar; the four ships (f), mentioned below, which were part of the combined fleet, were afterwards taken by captain sir Richard J. Strachan, (promoted November 9, to the rank of rear-admiral).

Sir Robert Calder's conduct in the action with the French and Spanish combined fleet not giving general satisfaction, he was brought to trial by a court martial on the 22nd of December following, on board his majesty's ship Prince of Wales, in Portsmouth harbour. The trial lasted some time, during which a great number of witnesses were examined; and when sir Robert Calder had made his defence, the court proceeded to give judgement; which was, "That the charges against him, for not having done his utmost to take and destroy every ship of the enemy, which it was his duty to engage, are fully proved: The court are of opinion, that such conduct on the part of sir Robert Calder was not the result of fear or cowardice, but of error in judgement; for which he deserves to be severely reprimanded, and he is hereby severely reprimanded accordingly." It was, however, thought by many, that sir Robert did not properly deserve this sentence, because with fifteen sail of the line he gained a partial victory over the enemy, whose fleet consisted of twenty; and he even took two ships, the one of eighty-four, and the other of seventy-four guns, from that fleet.

As the English were engaged as a party in the grand coalition of 1805 against France, it is proper that we say a few words on the state of Europe at the commencement of the year 1806, which may be justly said to be unexampled in the annals of history. Two rival nations, the French and the English, had acquired not merely a decided preponderance, but an absolute and uncontrouled dominion, the one over the land, and the other over the seas. The French, by gaining the battle of Austerlitz, had completely overthrown the powers on the continent, and confirmed the military superiority of France over other nations, and left her without a rival on the continent of Europe; while the victory of Trafalgar had no less decided the superiority of the naval power of England. But notwithstanding the naval prowess of England, she was unable to make any serious impression on the territories of France, or to weaken in the least the solid foundations of Napoleon's power.

By the treaty of Presburgh, the triumph of Napoleon over the continent of Europe was completed, and France was at liberty to direct her whole force and energy to the subjugation of England. No longer deterred by the fear of a continental coalition, she had only to decide upon the most expedient and practical mode of conducting an enterprize for that purpose; and if Great Britain had nothing to apprehend from the number of troops Bonaparte might be able to land on the shores of England, yet it must be well

(e) It is unnecessary to detail the number of killed and wounded on board each ship respectively, therefore we shall mention only the grand total: twenty-seven officers, sixteen petty officers, two hundred and ninety-nine seamen, and one hundred and thirteen marines, killed; forty-three officers, fifty-nine petty officers, nine hundred seamen, and two hundred and twelve marines, wounded.—Total one thousand six hundred and sixty-three.

(f) The following are part of the combined fleet which escaped on the day of battle with lord Nelson: 1. French ship Formidable, of eighty guns; hauled to the southward, and escaped. 2. French ship Mont Blanc, of seventy-four guns; hauled to the southward and escaped. 3. French ship Scipion, of seventy-four guns; hauled to the southward and escaped. 4. French ship Duguay Trouin, of seventy-four guns; hauled to the southward, and escaped.

well known that there were other parts of the British empire that were not equally invulnerable to his attacks. Ireland was exposed by her grievances to the seduction of his emissaries, and easily accessible by her situation to the invasion of his army. Rebellion had, in that country, been put down, it is true, but discontent still existed in the minds of the people. The fire, which had lately blazed with such fury, was smothered, but not extinguished. The rejection of the Catholic petition by parliament tended to keep the embers alive; and though the more moderate of the Catholics were ready to postpone the discussion of their claims, till the only obstacle to the redress of their grievances was removed, and the prudent and considerate were disinclined to those violent counsels, from which they had already suffered so much, it was not to be supposed that all the Irish Catholics were moderate and prudent, but that many of that body would join themselves to a French army so soon as it made its appearance in their country.

Mr. Pitt, the prime minister, was now sick at Bath; and his colleagues were men of inferior parts; so that England might be said at this time to be without any efficient government. So weak, indeed, were the colleagues of Mr. Pitt at this period, that they announced a great victory of the allies over the French, after the battle of Austerlitz, on no better authority than the report of a prating messenger, whose idle hearsays they had the weakness to believe, in preference to the dispatches of which he was the bearer. This miserable fabrication was eagerly circulated by the ministers then in town, and for some days it met with universal credit among their adherents; but when the history, as well as the falsehood was made known, it covered them with shame and ridicule, and exposed them to the derision of those who had been duped by their folly.

While affairs were in this posture, it was, that parliament, after repeated prorogations, was at length permitted to meet, on the 21st of January, 1806, and, as the state of his majesty's eyes did not allow him to open the meeting in person, it was accordingly done by commission.

The speech was read by the lord chancellor, and the address was moved in the house of lords by the earl of Essex, and in the house of commons by lord Francis Spencer. An amendment to the address was prepared and read in both houses, but was not brought forward as a motion on account of the indisposition of Mr. Pitt, who, it afterwards appeared, was at that very moment on his death bed. A report had been circulated in the morning of the 21st of January, that he was dangerously ill, and this had induced opposition to give up their intentions of moving the amendment they had prepared: but the very dangerous state to which he was reduced, was far from being suspected; and that very evening, in the house of commons, some of his most intimate friends asserted, that he was no longer in danger, but in a fair, though slow way of recovery.

Mr. Pitt had left Bath on the 10th of January, and on his arrival in the neighbourhood of London, took up his residence at his own house on Putney Heath. His health had been for some time in a most alarming state. He was reduced to the greatest possible weakness, and as the functions of his stomach were greatly impaired, there seemed to be little hopes of his speedy re-establishment. A suspicion having been entertained that his complaints proceeded from some organic disorder of the stomach, or liver, a consultation of physicians was held on his case, and he expressed great satisfaction at being told that they saw no reason to adopt such an opinion. He was then advised to seclude himself entirely from business, and to abandon every other care but that of his health, and upon these terms he was flattered with hopes of recovery. A few days after he was seized with symptoms of a Typhus fever. His pulse rose to one hundred and thirty, and his tongue and lips were dry and furred. He was occasionally delirious, and talked incoherently on various subjects, but in general he was drowsy and lethargic. When spoken to, he gave a pertinent answer, but relapsed immediately into incoherent language, and was quite incapable of any rational or connected conversation; nor, whatever stories have been circulated to the contrary, was he ever sensible of the danger of his situation. A constitution so exhausted as his had previously been, sunk rapidly under the violence of the fever, and early on the 23d of January he expired.

Thus died William Pitt, in the 47th year of his age, after having enjoyed greater power and popularity, and held the first place in the government of his country, for a longer course of years, than any former minister of England. It is not our province to enter at large into his character and merits. That he was a person of rare and splendid qualities, a powerful orator, an expert financier, his greatest enemies must admit. But, whether the appellation of an illustrious statesman has been justly applied to him, is a question on which men may reasonably differ.

On the 27th of January, Mr. H. Lascelles moved, in the house of commons, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, that his majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions that the remains of the right honourable William Pitt be interred at the public expence, and that a monument be erected in the collegiate church of St. Peter, Westminster, to the memory of that excellent statesman, with an inscription expressive of the public sense of so great and irreparable a loss; and to assure his majesty, that this house will make good the expences attending the same." The motion was carried by a majority of one hundred and sixty-nine.

On the 3rd of February, Mr. Cartwright moved, that a sum, not exceeding forty thousand pounds, should be voted for the payment of Mr. Pitt's debts; which motion was carried without opposition.

The common council of the city of London having met on the 6th of February, it was moved, that a monument be erected in Guildhall, to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Pitt, and after some debate the question was carried by a majority of six.

On the death of Mr. Pitt great difficulty occurred in the formation of a new administration, but the matter being at length adjusted, the cabinet was composed of the following members, viz. lord Erskine, lord high chancellor of England; earl Fitzwilliam, lord president of the council; viscount Sidmouth, lord privy seal; lord Grenville, first lord of the treasury; lord Howick, first lord of the admiralty; earl of Moira, master general of the ordnance; earl of Spencer, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Windham, secretaries of state for the home, foreign, and war departments; lord Henry Petty, lord chancellor of the exchequer; and lord Ellenborough, lord chief justice of England. The duke of Bedford went as lord lieutenant to Ireland, and Mr. Elliot accompanied him as chief secretary. Mr. George Ponsonby was appointed chancellor and keeper of the seals in Ireland, and sir John Newport, chancellor of the Irish exchequer. So complete a change in all the departments of the state had not taken place since 1784.

The subject of military arrangements was the first matter of consequence submitted to the consideration of parliament by the new ministers. Then followed the army of reserve bill, which was one of the most oppressive measures that could possibly be adopted, since it compelled thirty-eight thousand out of forty thousand who were unfortunate enough to be drawn, to find substitutes at an enormous expence, to the great detriment and impoverishment of their families.

The spirit of determined hostility to the new military system, which had marked the conduct of the opposition, in their defence of the additional force bill, continued to animate them throughout the subsequent debates, when the different parts of that system came in detail before the house. The Mutiny Bill, the Chelsea Hospital Bill, the Training Bill, and the Militia Officers' Bill, gave rise to very long debates, which, from the frequent recurrence of the same topics, became at length tiresome and uninteresting.

In this anxiety shewn by government for improving the present condition, and adding to the future prospects of the army, the interests of the navy were not forgotten. In a committee of supply (April 25th) lord Howick explained to the house the intentions of government respecting the allowance of additional pay to the officers, petty officers, and seamen of the royal navy, and on the motion of the same noble lord a sum was voted for enabling government to carry that measure into effect. Two acts of parliament were afterwards passed, in pursuance of a recommendation from his majesty, to empower the governors of Greenwich Hospital and the directors of the chest of Greenwich, to increase the allowances to out-pensioners of Greenwich Hospital, and to grant pensions to old, infirm, and disabled officers, not provided for in that hospital, in addition to their half-pay; and in order to defray these expences, additional funds were appropriated by act of parliament to the support and increase of that noble establishment.

The new ministers followed the financial system of their predecessors; but the Property Tax Bill gave great discontent, content, and met with great opposition in its progress through the house, particularly from the independent members, who reprobated in strong terms the harshness and rigour of its provisions.

The attention of parliament was next called to a reform in the mode of auditing the public accounts. It appeared that in consequence of the imperfection of the provisions established for that object, there had been a gradual accumulation of inaudited accounts, amounting, when the present ministers came into office, to the enormous sum of five hundred and thirty-four millions!!! Not a single account in the army pay office had been audited since 1782. The store accounts had been suffered to lie over, without examination, during the same period. The navy accounts were greatly in arrear. None of the accounts of the late war were audited, and those relating to the expeditions to Holland and Egypt, and to the treaties of subsidy with foreign powers, had not even been touched upon by the auditors.

The abuses to which the accumulation of inaudited accounts had given rise in the West Indies, were so glaring, that, in 1800, commissioners had been sent thither to investigate them; in consequence of which malversations to an enormous extent were detected. New commissioners were then appointed by act of parliament, with authority to correct and remedy the evil. But, though much good was effected by the exertions of these commissioners, the system of fraud and profusion, which they were sent out to stop, continued to go on; and no crime was spared by the actors in this scene of delinquency, that could serve to screen them from detection, or secure them from punishment. Forgery, perjury, bribery, and every iniquitous stratagem, which fraud could devise, was resorted to; and not content with false charges, false returns, and flagitious embezzlements, they bribed the custom-house officers to sign false certificates, fraudulent invoices, and other such documents, in aid of their mal-practices; proofs of which were detected, in one instance, to the amount of eighty thousand pounds, and in another, to the amount of thirty thousand pounds applied in bribery, to conceal frauds of an enormous extent.

The attention of parliament, during the present session, was called to another subject, connected with the reform of abuses, arising out of the first report of the commissioners of military enquiry, appointed in Mr. Pitt's last administration. It appeared from the report of these commissioners, that lieutenant general de Lancey, late barrack master general, who filled that office from 1793 to 1804, had been accustomed, in making up his accounts with the public, to take credit to himself for one per cent. on the whole expenditure of the barrack department, under the title of contingencies for additional charge and responsibility upon unsettled accounts; it appeared also that he had charged the public twice in one year with his pay and allowances; from the whole of which it followed, that, supposing his accounts, not yet audited, to be in other respects correct, but subducting these charges, which on no account could be allowed, he was indebted to the public in the sum of ninety-seven thousand four hundred and fifteen pounds, instead of six thousand eight hundred and sixty-five pounds, which was the balance he acknowledged to be due by him. The report containing these statements was laid before the house on the 21st of March, and ordered to be printed; but no further notice was taken of it till the 8th of May, when lord Henry Petty, referring to it, assured the house, that not only would the suggestions contained in that report with respect to the mode of auditing the barrack accounts, be attended to, in the general measure then under consideration for improving the mode of auditing the public accounts, but that immediate steps would be taken by government for recovering the balance that appeared to be due by the late barrack master general.

The grants of public money during this session of parliament were numerous and considerable; but the greater part of them were such, as fully to deserve as well as to receive the approbation of the country. The grants to the family of lord Nelson, to the seamen who had fought in the battle of Trafalgar, to lord Collingwood, sir Richard Strachan, and sir John Duckworth, were of that description. The public submitted without a murmur to the additional burthens occasioned by these arrangements. But it was with feelings of a different sort, that it beheld, in the moment of national distress, an additional allowance of income, solicited from the throne and granted by the commons to the younger branches of the royal family. It was desirable, no doubt, that the royal dukes, as peers of parliament, should be independent of the minister of the day; and, if their present incomes were inadequate to the necessary expences of their station, it was fitting, on the first proper occasion, to increase them. But, to see the ministers of the crown come with an application for that purpose to parliament, within a fortnight after raising the property tax to ten per cent. excited a general feeling in the country, against the importunity that could solicit, and the facility that could grant so ill-timed a largess; for no one would contend that the increase of income to the royal family, supposing it proper to have been granted, might not have been postponed to another session, or even till the return of peace.

There is not any part of the conduct of the new ministers which reflected greater credit on their sincerity and consistency, than the measures they adopted, shortly after their coming into office, in regard to the abolition of the African slave trade. The last motion made by Mr. Fox in the house of commons was to propose a resolution, couched in the strongest language, against this iniquitous traffic; and in his speech on that occasion, almost the last he delivered in that assembly, he declared, that, "so fully was he impressed with the vast importance and necessity of attaining what would be the object of his motion that night, that if, during the almost forty years that he had had the honour of a seat in parliament, he had been so fortunate to accomplish that, and that only, he should think that he had done enough, and could retire from public life with comfort, and conscious satisfaction, that he had done his duty." The attorney general, therefore, with the concurrence of the cabinet, and in his official capacity, brought in a bill for the purpose, which passed both houses with but trifling opposition, and afterwards received the royal assent.

The remaining proceedings of parliament during this session (with the exception of lord Melville's trial) either related to subjects of less general importance than those we have mentioned, or they were left in an incomplete state at the close of the session, or they failed in attaining their objects.

The trial of lord viscount Melville excited great interest in all parts of the country: many of the people were irritated against that nobleman when the charges of peculation were exhibited against him; but as he was acquitted by a majority of the lords, we must suppose he was not so extensively guilty of the mal-practices laid to his charge as many people were inclined to imagine. His lordship was acquitted on the 12th of June, in Westminster Hall.

It was about the middle of April, 1806, that sir Sidney Smith arrived at Palermo, in the Pompée of eighty-four guns, and took upon him the command of the English squadron destined for the defence of Sicily, consisting of five ships of the line, besides frigates, transports, and gun boats. With this force he sailed to Italy, and began his operations on Gaeta, by introducing supplies of stores and ammunition, of which its garrison had been greatly in want. He then went to the island of Capri, of which he took possession, after a slight resistance, and placed in it an English garrison.

On the 6th of July, sir John Stuart obtained a signal victory over the French general Regnier, in Calabria; and the peasants, already ripe for insurrection, took up arms against the French, cut off their stragglers, pursued their flying parties, and attacked their posts. The French provoked by their defeat, and exasperated by the cruelty of the insurgents, who gave no quarter to such as fell into their hands, retaliated their savage cruelty with interest. The villages, which declared against them, were plundered and burned to the ground, and the inhabitants generally massacred without distinction of age or sex. At length, unable to contend with their numerous and exasperated assailants, the French were compelled to evacuate both Upper and Lower Calabria, and to abandon the cannon, stores, and ammunition, which they had collected in those provinces with a view to invade Sicily. But successful as sir John Stuart had been in Calabria, he was sensible of his inability to maintain his conquests, and therefore announced his intention of returning without loss of time to Sicily.

But the loss of Gaeta, which surrendered to the French soon after the battle of Maida, more than counterbalanced the successes of the allies in other parts of Calabria. The surrender of this fortress cut off the communication with the northern parts of the kingdom of Naples, and set at liberty sixteen thousand French troops, previously employed in that siege, to act against the Calabrians. By a decree issued at Naples on the 31st of July, the two Calabrias were declared in a state of war, and subjected to all the horrors of military law. Massena was placed at the head of a powerful army; and, on the 16th of August, the advanced guard of the French forces entered Cosenza, the capital of Upper Calabria; and before the beginning of September, the French had recovered the whole of that province, except a few places which was deemed of little importance (g).

A correspondence took place between the ministers of France and England, relative to peace, which lasted six months, and which was broken off without coming to a favourable termination.

On the 14th of February, about ten days after Mr. Fox came into office, he received a letter from a person calling himself Guillet de la Gevrillière, stating that he was arrived at Gravesend without a passport, and requesting Mr. Fox to send him one, as he had very lately left Paris, and had something to communicate which would give Mr. Fox satisfaction. On receiving this letter Mr. Fox gave orders, through sir Francis Vincent, under secretary of state, to Mr. Brooke of the alien office, to send for the man from Gravesend, and a private interview having been solicited, to bring him on his arrival to Mr. Fox's house in Arlington Street, instead of taking him to the foreign office. In consequence of these orders the Frenchman was next morning carried to Mr. Fox's house, and there admitted by him alone into his closet; when after some unimportant conversation, he proceeded to the object of his journey, which was to inform Mr. Fox that a plan had been entered into for the assassination of Bonaparte, and a house hired at Passy, from which it could be carried into effect with certainty, and without risk. Surprized and confounded with the audacity of the villain, in making him the confident of so execrable a design, Mr. Fox, without enquiring farther into the particulars of the plot, instantly dismissed the Frenchman from his presence, and desired Mr. Brooke to send him as soon as possible out of the kingdom. But on reflection he ordered him to be detained, till such information could be given to the French government, as might hinder the perpetration of his crime, if really projected; and with that view he transmitted to M. Talleyrand, on the 20th of February, a short and simple statement of the occurrence, and of what he had done thereupon. The answer to this communication, dated the 5th of March, was a natural and well turned compliment to the honour and generosity of Mr. Fox's character, and was accompanied by an extract from the emperor's speech to the legislative body, in order, as M. Talleyrand observed, "that Mr. Fox might know, if the advantages of peace were duly appreciated, on what terms it might be discussed." The extract was a simple offer "to conclude peace, taking for its basis the stipulations of the treaty of Amiens."

While the correspondence was carrying on, and in consequence of the conciliatory manner in which it had been conducted, Mr. Fox had solicited as a personal favour the release of several of his private acquaintance prisoners at Verdun, the peculiar circumstances of whose detention had rendered any arrangement for their exchange impracticable, as it would have been derogatory to the dignity of the country to have acknowledged the principle on which they had been detained. The applications of Mr. Fox were in many instances successful, and among the persons named by him was the earl of Yarmouth, only son of the marquis of Hertford, who together with his wife and family, had been detained in France since the commencement of the war. On lord Yarmouth's arrival in London, early in June, he communicated the substance of a conversation with M. Talleyrand, which had passed at the desire of that minister, for the purpose of conveying through a secret and confidential channel, the sentiments and views of France, and the outlines of the terms, on which peace might be restored between the two countries. The terms sketched out in the conversation seemed so favourable, that the English cabinet lost no time in conveying to M. Talleyrand their disposition to commence a negociation, on the basis contained in them. The bearer of the proposition was better able to judge of, and to enforce the adherence to the terms proposed, than any other person whatever; the residence of his family in France rendered lord Yarmouth's return less liable to public observation; and it was understood, that excepting himself, no one would have been permitted to remain twelve hours in France, without producing full powers to negociate a treaty of peace. These were probably the reasons, which induced the English cabinet to direct lord Yarmouth to return.

Lord Yarmouth remained in France for a long time, but it being apprehended that the affair would be better conducted by another hand, lord Lauderdale was sent to take the lead in the negociation; but by the policy of M. Talleyrand, that nobleman was unable to bring the matter to a favourable issue, and, considering the negociation at an end after several fruitless efforts, at length peremptorily insisted on his passports.

In the war which was now carried on between Prussia and France, the Prussian government was guilty of great errors, when it determined upon hostilities. It was at first concluded that the king, assisted by a council of general officers, would take the command of the army in person; but he was inexperienced in war, diffident of his own abilities, and unsteady in his determinations; therefore a very unfit person to oppose to the greatest military genius which this or any other age ever produced. The whole force, Prussians and Saxons, under the command of the duke of Brunswick, did not amount to less than one hundred and fifty thousand men.

But while this immense army remained inactive on the banks of the Saale, the French were collecting their scattered troops and concentrating their forces in the neighbourhood of Bamberg. On the 6th of October, Bonaparte arrived at Bamberg; and on the 8th, the French army was in motion to attack the Prussians. The Prussians, by some unaccountable oversight, left their magazines at Hof, Zurchau, Weissenfels, and Naumberg, without protection, and the French, taking advantage of their neglect, cut them off from these repositories; so that the Prussians had no alternative but to fight or starve. There were no resources in the country of Weimar for maintaining so large an army and numerous cavalry as the Prussian. There was no bread, no beer, no brandy for their men, and no fodder for their horses. When their cavalry took the field in the morning of the battle of Auerstadt, the horses had been without corn, and the men without food for two nights and a day.

After several partial battles, in which the Prussians were great losers, both armies were employed in making arrangements for the important battle which decided the fate of Prussia. The French army extended from Naumberg to Kahla, along the Saale, a line of six hours march, its centre being at Jena; and the Prussians, who had been collecting the whole of their forces into one point, were assembled betwixt Auerstadt, Weimar, and Jena. At break of day on the 14th, the whole of the French army was under arms. The light troops of the centre began the action on the Prussians, which drove them from their advanced positions, and enabled the French to extend their line on the plain, and draw up in order of battle. The Prussian left, amounting to about fifty thousand men, were dispatched to take possession of the defiles of Korsen; but these were already occupied by Davoust, whom they attacked eleven times successively, but could not dislodge. Their centre, consisting of eighty thousand men, was opposed to the French centre at Jena; and these were the only two divisions of their army engaged in the heat of the action. At length the action became general; and two hundred and fifty, or three hundred thousand men, with seven or eight hundred pieces of artillery, scattered death in every direction, and exhibited one of the most aweful scenes ever beheld. The Prussian infantry behaved with courage and firmness; but their cavalry, worn out, fatigued, and disheartened, maintained not their ancient reputation. The French cavalry charged with the greatest spirit and intrepidity, and their artillery performed wonders. The Prussians were every where thrown into disorder; and the charge of the French cavalry, at the close of the day, was irresistible. Neither cavalry nor infantry could withstand the shock; artillery, cavalry, infantry, all were put to the (g) The Calabrian insurgents were indeed a set of miserable miscreants, for while the French were still at a distance, a report was spread that they were advancing to attack them, on which their chiefs fled, and the mass of the insurgents, after recovering from their first panic, committed such acts of murder, cruelty, and rapine, that sir John Stuart found it necessary to send detachments of British troops into the country, to put a stop to their excesses.

rout.

rout. The king himself quitted the high road, and, at the head of a small body of cavalry, escaped across the fields. According to the French accounts, more than twenty thousand Prussians were killed or wounded in this battle, and from thirty thousand to forty thousand taken prisoners. Above twenty generals and lieutenant generals were made prisoners, with three hundred pieces of cannon and sixty standards were taken. The duke of Brunswick was among the slain.

On the 27th, Bonaparte made his public entry into Berlin; and the next day gave audience to the foreign ministers of powers in amity with France, resident in that city.

Several actions took place with the remainder of the Prussian troops, who were every where overthrown with great slaughter, and many fell into the hands of the French. At length, the surrender of Plassenburg, a small fortress in the territory of Bayreuth, completed the conquest of the Prussian fortresses in Germany to the west of the Oder.

The elector of Hesse Cassel was expelled from his dominions, because he had sold the blood of his subjects to England, and because his existence on the frontiers of the French empire was incompatible with its safety; the duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin suffered the same fate, November 27. The houses of Brunswick Lunenburg and Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, which had taken an active part in the war, were deprived of their states. A few days after the battle of Auerstadt, on the 25th of October, the house of Brunswick was declared to have lost the sovereignty of its ancestors; and soon after the occupation of Hesse, Mortier marched into Hanover, and took formal possession of the electorate, on the 14th of November. Of all the princes of Germany, who had joined with Prussia in the war, none were treated with clemency by the French emperor, except the elector of Saxony and the princes of the house of Saxe. By a treaty signed at Posen on the 11th of December, the elector was declared king of Saxony, and he and the other princes of the house of Saxe were admitted into the confederation of the Rhine, and received under that denomination among the new vassals of the French empire. The dukes of Saxe Weimar and Saxe Gotha were in the number of princes, who consented to hold their dominions upon those terms.

General Mortier entered Hamburgh on the 19th of November, and the next day issued an order for the sequestration of all English produce and manufactures found in the city, whether belonging to English subjects or to other persons. The English merchants at this town were put under arrest, and though afterwards released on their parole, they were placed under a guard, and threatened to be sent to Verdun.

So sound was the policy of Bonaparte, that he was ever anxious to connect the members of his family with the other princes of Europe, and on the 4th of March, 1806, he announced to the senate his intention of uniting in marriage the princess Stephanie Beauharnois, niece of the empress Josephine, with the hereditary prince of Baden.

But Bonaparte's next communication was of more importance. On the 31st of March he submitted to the senate a variety of decrees for its approbation; by the first of which he established various regulations for the education of the princes of his imperial house; by the second he annexed the Venetian territories to the kingdom of Italy; by the third he conferred the kingdom of Naples on his brother Joseph; by the fourth he bestowed the duchies of Berg and Cleves, in full sovereignty, on his brother-in-law Murat; and the principality of Guastalla on his sister Paulina, and her husband, prince Borghese; by the fifth he gave to Berthier the principality of Neufchatel; by the sixth he united to Lucca, the countries of Massa, Carrara, and Garragnana; and by the seventh he created a number of duchies, with suitable revenues, in Italy, to be distributed among the civil and military officers, who had distinguished themselves in his service, and to be held by them in property, transmissible by inheritance to their direct descendants in the male line (h).

The erection of the duchy of Benevento into a fief of the French empire, in favour of Talleyrand, with the title of prince and duke of Benevento; and the grant of the duchy of Ponte Corvo to marshal Bernadotte, by a similar tenure, followed some months after the preceding establishments, on the 5th of June. Cardinal Fesch, uncle of Bonaparte, was appointed at the same time to be co-adjutor and successor of the archbishop of Ratisbon, archchancellor of the Germanic empire. A new order of knighthood was also instituted for the kingdom of Italy, called the order of the Iron Crown, and established on the footing of two hundred knights companions, besides commanders and other higher dignitaries. Many Frenchmen as well as Italians were decorated with insignia of this order.—Thus we find that Bonaparte was strengthening himself by every means, in the countries where he had got the ascendency.

This year our navy was likewise successful. On the 6th of February, admiral sir J. T. Duckworth descried a French squadron of five ships of the line, two frigates, and a corvette, which he gave chase to, and an action commenced, which lasted with great fury for two hours, when three of the French line of battle ships remained prizes to the English, and two were driven on shore and burnt. The two frigates and corvettes made their escape. Sir J. T. Duckworth's squadron consisted of seven ships of the line and four frigates. The French squadron was commanded by admiral Leisseigues.

Another part of the Brest fleet, commanded by admiral Villaumez, was destined for the Cape of Good Hope; but learning that that settlement had been captured by the English, he bent his course to the West Indies. This squadron consisted of six ships of the line and one frigate; but to intercept it several squadrons were dispatched from England, of which admiral Villaumez having received intelligence, determined not to sail home in a body, but to separate his fleet. The Veteran of seventy-four guns, commanded by Jerome Bonaparte, seems to have been the first that separated from the squadron. On the 16th of August he fell in with the homeward bound Quebec fleet, of which he took and destroyed six vessels laden with timber and other valuable articles; and on the 26th of the same month, after having been chased by the English, it reached the coast of Britanny in safety, and entered the harbour of Concarneau, under the protection of the batteries, where, though the vessel was stranded, the stores and guns were saved, and the captain and the crew got on shore with safety. Some of the rest were greatly damaged in a severe storm, and were eventfully destroyed by the English on the shores of America. The Cassant, one of the French fleet, which it was generally believed had foundered at sea, arrived safely at Brest in the middle of October.

The French admiral Linois, who had for a long period traversed the Indian seas, carrying on a successful and destructive war against our commerce in the East, was this year intercepted in his return to Europe, with his plunder, by sir John Borlase Warren, on the 13th of March, and brought to England, with the Marengo of eighty guns, and the Belle Poule of forty guns, being the only two ships under his command.

On the 24th of September, five large frigates and two corvettes, with troops on board for the West Indies, escaped from Rochefort, and were met the next day at sea by the squadron under commodore sir Samuel Hood; and after a running fight of several hours, four of the five frigates were compelled to strike. The English commander received a severe wound in the right arm, which was obliged to be amputated immediately.

In military matters we have to record that an expedition against the Cape of Good Hope, having on board five thousand iand forces under sir David Baird, with a proportional naval equipment under sir Home Popham, reached Table Bay on the 4th of January, 1806. So soon as the weather would permit, the disembarkation of the troops was effected, and sir David Baird began his march to Cape Town on the morning of the 8th. Having reached the Blue Mountains, he there discovered the enemy drawn up in the plain, and prepared to receive him. At the commencement of the action, the Dutch received the British fire without quitting their ground, but, at the moment of charging, they gave way and fled with precipitation. In this action the loss of the enemy exceeded seven hundred killed and wounded, while that of the British army amounted only to fifteen killed and one hundred and ninety-seven wounded and missing. The English reached the Salt River on the 9th, where they intended to encamp, but a flag of truce being sent from the town with offers of capitulation, the articles were soon settled, and the British were put in possession of Fort Knocke the same evening. The capitulation was signed the next day, and the town surrendered. General Janssens seemed disposed to maintain (h) The last of these decrees presents the curious spectacle of the revival of benefices of Bonaparte, within less than twenty years after the extinction of the feudal institutions, derived from the victories and destructive conquests of Charlemagne.

himself

himself in the interior, to which he retired; but he was prevailed upon by general Beresford to surrender upon terms; which he did, and by the articles of capitulation, signed January 18, it was agreed, that general Janssens and his army should be sent back to Holland and not be considered as prisoners of war, in return for the compleat surrender of the colony and its dependencies.

Sir Home Popham, the naval commander in the capture of the Cape of Good Hope, had long entertained an idea, that if an expedition were sent against the Spanish settlements on the Rio de la Plata, and having been successful in gaining possession of the Cape, he turned his thoughts to the conquest of Buenos Ayres; and having persuaded sir David Baird to acquiesce in his plans, he obtained from that officer a small body of troops under general Beresford. He then sailed from the Cape about the middle of April, without leaving a single armed vessel to protect that colony from insult, and directed his course to St. Helena, where he obtained from the governor a small reinforcement to his little army, which after all did not exceed one thousand six hundred men, including marines. With this inadequate force he steered for the Rio de la Plata, and arrived at the mouth of that river in the beginning of June. It was now debated, whether an attack should be made on Buenos Ayres or Monte Video, and the former being preferred, the troops were removed from the line of battle ships into the transports and frigate that accompanied the expedition, in which, after surmounting with great skill and perseverance the difficulties of a most intricate navigation, they arrived before Buenos Ayres on the 24th of June, and next day disembarked without resistance at the Punta de Quilmes, about twelve miles from that city. A body of Spaniards placed on the height at two miles distance, witnessed the landing of the British army without opposing it, and general Beresford having marched against them on the following morning, they fled with precipitation at the first fire, leaving behind them their artillery. No other difficulty occurred after this success, except the passage of a river, which it was necessary to cross, before getting to Buenos Ayres; but this being effected with the help of rafts and boats, the bridge having been burnt by the enemy, general Beresford entered the city on the 27th, the viceroy having previously abandoned it and fled to Cordova, with the small body of troops under his command. While the army was thus employed in the conquest of Buenos Ayres, the line of battle ships of the squadron made demonstrations before Monte Video and Maldonado, in order to alarm and occupy the garrisons of these places, in which, as it afterwards appeared, were stationed the regular troops of the colony, while the defence of Buenos Ayres, from its situation, supposed to be less liable to attack, had been committed to the militia. To this accident, and to the misconduct and timidity of the viceroy, who was quite inexperienced in military affairs, the success of an expedition, undertaken not more in defiance of the rules of discipline than in opposition to the dictates of prudence, may in a great measure be attributed. About one million two hundred thousand dollars of public money were found in the town and sent to England; besides which, public property in quicksilver and Jesuits' bark, to the value of nearly three millions of dollars, was seized for the benefit of the captors; but before it was secured on board of ship, the place was retaken by the enemy (i).

When intelligence reached government of sir Home Popham's unauthorized departure from the Cape, and meditated invasion of South America, orders were instantly dispatched to recall him home, and put a stop to his expedition. These orders, however, were too late to prevent his enterprize; and when the news of his success arrived, the strong objections to his plan were drowned in the universal joy at the fortunate result of his operations. A conquest, which the government would not have made, it had not the resolution to abandon; or possibly, deceived by the ease with which the victory had been gained, it gave in to the popular delusion, and supposed that South America required only to be attacked, in order to be subdued. The British government seemed as it were bewildered as to the course they ought to take in the present state of Spanish America; and long before the system proper to be followed with Buenos Ayres came to be discussed in the British cabinet, that settlement was in the hands of the Spaniards.

The Spaniards were at first taken by surprize, but so soon as they recovered from their panic, they collected the few troops they had in the neighbourhood, and a desperate action took place, in the streets and great square of the town, in which the English were attacked with incredible fury, and severely annoyed by a destructive fire from the windows and balconies of the houses, and were at last compelled to lay down their arms, and surrender themselves prisoners of war, but, instead of conforming to the articles, they were marched up the country. The loss of the English in this action amounted to one hundred and sixty-five killed, wounded, and missing, besides one thousand three hundred made prisoners.

Thus terminated the first expedition to Buenos Ayres, and such were the bitter fruits of an enterprize, undertaken without authority, and originating in a "breach of public duty," which, though alleviated by circumstances, was adjudged by a court martial to be "highly censurable," and, for the general good of his majesty's service, deserving of a "severe reprimand (k)."

Sir Home Popham then continued to blockade the river, till the arrival of troops from the Cape, on the 5th or 12th of October, enabled him to recommence offensive operations. He then attempted to get possession of Monte Video, but finding his ships could not be brought near enough to act, he desisted. He then landed at Maldonado, and drove the Spaniards from the isle of Gorriti, where he encamped his troops, and found safe anchorage for his ships. In this situation our army remained at the end of the year, receiving successive reinforcements from England and the Cape, and preparing for farther and more disastrous successes.

We have now to record the death of the honourable Charles James Fox, who was born January 29, 1748, and who had received from nature an uncommon vigour of constitution, and notwithstanding the irregularities of his youth, he had enjoyed uninterrupted health till about two years before his death, when the seeds of the disorder, to which he fell afterwards a victim, were probably formed. Having in the summer of 1804 made too free use of the waters of Cheltenham, he was soon after seized with a pain of his right side, which from its consequences was probably occasioned by an affection of the liver; and though he soon got apparently well from that attack, he never enjoyed again his former health, but was subject to frequent invasions of a disorder of his bowels. In the beginning of 1806 he attended the funeral of lord Nelson, and being then exposed for many hours to the cold, he was seized with a return of his complaint, and was never entirely free from it afterwards for any length of time. In this state of health he was called to take a principal part in the direction of his majesty's councils, and besides his office of secretary of state for foreign affairs, he was prevailed upon to undertake the fatiguing duty of daily attendance in the house of commons, as leader in that assembly on the part of government. The labour and anxiety of these avocations probably accelerated the progress of his disease, and certainly hindered him from having recourse in time to the measures necessary for his recovery. At length, about the middle of June, he became so seriously indisposed, that he was forced to discontinue his attendance in parliament. Symptoms of both general and local dropsy declared themselves, and so rapid was the progress of his complaint, that after the middle of July, though informed of every step taken by his colleagues in the negociations with France, he could seldom be consulted by them on that or any other public measures, till they had been carried into effect. It was at length thought necessary by his physicians to have recourse to the usual operation for his relief, which was accordingly performed for the first time on the 7th of August, and repeated again on the 31st. After both operations he fell into a state of languor and depression, but his medical attendants never absolutely despaired of his case till the 7th of September, when he sunk into an alarming state of lowness, in which he languished till the evening of the 13th, when he expired. He retained to the last his senses and understanding, and till a very short time before his death he continued to have

(i) Extravagant was the joy and delusive the expectations, which the news of the capture of Buenos Ayres diffused through every part of the British empire. A circular manifesto from sir Home Popham to the principal mercantile and manufacturing cities, announcing and certainly not under-rating the value of the market he had opened, spread widely and rapidly the most exaggerated notions of his conquest; and led to many rash and improvident mercantile speculations, in which the adventurers had reason afterwards to lament their credulity.

(k) See the sentence of the court martial in the trial of sir Home Popham, March 11, 1807.

confident

confident hopes of his recovery. The cause of his death was ascertained to have been a schirrous affection of the liver.

The account of Mr. Fox's death was received at court with coldness and indifference, and such inquiries into the particulars of that event as curiosity dictated, were addressed to those, who from the recentness of their connection with him, were the least likely to receive gratification from those inquiries, or consider them as marks of an interest in his fate. No haste was expressed to fill up the vacancy occasioned by his death.

At length the new cabinet was formed, and lord Holland was appointed to succeed lord Sidmouth as lord privy seal. It may be necessary to observe, that lord Holland, the nephew of Mr. Fox, was the only new member brought into the cabinet. And the only measure of the new ministry that falls under our notice is the dissolution of parliament.

Ireland enjoyed tranquillity during the greater part of the present year, under the mild and conciliatory government of the duke of Bedford. It may be questioned, indeed, whether the system of conciliation, pursued by that amiable and excellent nobleman, was not carried farther than prudence justified, or popular discontent could bear. Since the Catholics could not be gratified with the restoration of their privileges, they might have been soothed by the public disgrace of their enemies, and relieved from future apprehension by purging the magistracy of their torturers and persecutors. Towards the close of the year, disturbances broke out in the north-west of Ireland, occasioned by a banditti, who went about in the night time under the name of Threshers, committing every sort of crime and outrage. Strong applications were made to the Castle, to have these disturbances put down by the insurrection law, the usual remedy in Ireland on such occasions; but the duke of Bedford refused to have recourse, without necessity, to so violent a remedy, and he succeeded in repressing and putting a stop to these excesses by a proper use of the ordinary and regular authority of government.

The year 1807 was a very eventful time; for in the course of it the continent of Europe experienced great and important changes: we therefore regret that our limits confine us to give a mere outline of those interesting particulars, which, if detailed at full length, would require a large volume. Never, perhaps, since the contest between religious tyranny and religious liberty, the sister and powerful ally of political freedom, in the reign of the emperor Charles V. was there so eventful a crisis as that we are now to describe. France and Russia, the two most powerful nations on the face of the earth, contended on the banks of the Vistula for the empire of the political world; and this appeared to be put in a train for being settled at the peace of Tilsit: while expeditions from Great Britain were sent to every quarter of the world.

There are in this year two campaigns which demand particular attention: the first was terminated by the long cessation of arms, at least of field operations, which succeeded to the horrible battle of Eylau: the second, that which was opened at the beginning of June, and terminated in the armistice that followed the decisive battle of Friedland.

Every eye was now turned to the north; for the genius and sources of the northern powers were now brought into conflict with those of the south. A mighty contest was to be decided by arms between Alexander emperor of all the Russias, and the king of Prussia on the one part, and, on the other, Napoleon emperor of France and king of Italy. The former likewise depended on the aid of Sweden, and the co-operation of Great Britain; while the latter derived support from the nations whom he had conquered or intimidated, viz. Italy, Spain, Holland, and a great part of Germany. There was also another ally, much more powerful than the former, on which the Russians, no doubt, placed their principal alliance, namely, a rigorous climate to which they themselves were inured, but which might prove fatal to the soldiers from a more southern clime.

Napoleon seems to have acted with a great deal of wisdom and sound policy; for he carried on negociations with different courts at the same time, professing his wish to cultivate the arts of peace. He laboured to detach the king of Sweden from the cause of his allies, by professions of good will, respect, and admiration, and even by dismemberments in his favour, of Prussia and Denmark. He roused the Turks to war against Russia, and entered into a negociation for an alliance offensive and defensive with the emperor of Persia. Ambassadors were seen in his camp from Isfahan and Constantinople. Eighty-four pieces of cannon taken from the Russian generals Kamenskoy, Bennigsen, and Buxhoevden, in the battles of Czarnowo, Nasielsk, Pultusk, and Golymin, were ranged before the palace of the republic of Warsaw; and that the effect which the sight of so grand a triumph was fitted to produce might be greater, it was observed, "That they were the very same that the Russians drew along the streets of that city with so much ostentation, when lately they marched through them to meet the French." It was stated, that in the battles with the Russians, the Russians lost great part of their artillery, all their baggage, and from twenty-five to thirty thousand men, killed, wounded, or prisoners. It is well known that Gazettes are strongly inclined to magnify advantages gained on one side, and exaggerate losses sustained on the other. This bias, at the period now spoken of, was carried to a pitch of extravagance on the part of the Russian generals, altogether unprecedented: so that the French accounts were more to be depended on than the Russian, as was proved from the evidence of facts.

After the battle of Pultusk, the French retired into winter-quarters on the Vistula. The Russians fell back by Ostrolenka, on the Niemen. The king and queen of Prussia, with the ministry, the treasure, the most valuable property, and a guard of one thousand five hundred troops, horse and foot, retreated to Memel. The other troops remaining to the king of Prussia, were as follow: there were five thousand under the command of general Lestocq, the greater part of which remained in Konigsberg. There was a garrison of six thousand Prussians in Dantzig, of two thousand at Colberg, and of three thousand at Graudenz. And from fifteen to twenty thousand were dispersed in the different garrisons of Silesia. A military officer from England, encouraged the king in this extremity, when he was literally cooped up in the most remote and smallest corner of his kingdom, with the promise of assistance in both money and troops, and the immediate advance of eighty thousand pounds for maintaining the garrisons in Silesia. The Russian army was computed at one hundred and sixty thousand; the strength of the French army was estimated by some at one hundred and fifty thousand. Reinforcements of troops advanced from time to time during the whole of the campaign, to both armies.

The grand Russian army, towards the end of January, was supported on one side, by a corps of Russians and Prussians under the generals Lestocq, Pahlen, and Gallitzin, flanked on their right by the Frisch-haff and the Pregel, and covered on its left flank by a corps under general Von Essen, originally destined against Moldavia. The command of the army after the battle of Pultusk, was given to general Bennigsen, who had formed a junction with general Buxhoevden after his defeat at Golymin.

As the eye of the Russian general was fixed on the Vistula, so that of Bonaparte was directed to the Pregel and the Niemen; who, perceiving that the Russians designed to give him no rest in his winter quarters, determined, with his usual foresight, to take advantage of his assailant, and to anticipate an attack, by making one.

The Russian general Markovv, with a division of the corps under the command of the counts Pahlen and Gallitzin, attacked the French at Mohringen, on the 25th of January. After a sharp action in which the eagle of the 9th regiment of the French infantry was taken, the Russians were repulsed. But being afterwards reinforced by a division of cavalry under general Anrep, the battle was renewed. In these actions at Mohringen, the French lost more than one thousand men, in killed and wounded; the Russians left twelve thousand dead on the field of battle, and among these, general Anrep, whose death was greatly deplored by the whole Russian army.—The Russian and French details of the battle of Mohringen, though different, were not very inconsistent in any material point, except that both parties claimed the victory: but we have before made an observation concerning the Russian accounts.

On the 1st of February the whole of the French army was in motion, and several battles took place between different corps of the respective armies, in which the Russians were generally worsted. But in Eylau, where the Russians wished to maintain themselves, but which the French were eager to possess, before the commencement of the general battle, the contest was most bloody. The Russians had placed some regiments in a church and the yard around it. There they made a most obstinate resistance, and the post was not taken till after a dreadful carnage on both sides, at ten o'clock at night. The night was spent by the two armies under the bare canopy of heaven, facing each other. One division of the French army, under Le Grand, was posted in front of the village; and one under Saint Hilaire, on its right. The corps of Augereau was placed on its left. That of Davoust had been detached in the evening, to stretch beyond Eylau, and to come round and fall on the left flank of the Russians, if they should not have changed their position. Marshal Ney was likewise in motion to outflank and fall on them on the right. On the following morning, (February 8,) the Russians commenced the attack with a brisk cannonade on the village of Eylau, and the division under Saint Hilaire. The emperor, with his guards, took post in the church and burying ground, which the Russians had so well defended the day before. Thus, in a contest, maintained for twelve hours, during the whole of which time, three hundred pieces of cannon vomited death from the opposite lines so near each other, the carnage could not be otherwise than great. The Russians left seven thousand dead on the field of battle. The French general, marshal Augereau, was wounded, general Hautpoult died of his wounds. "Thus, (says the bulletin,) the Russian expedition, which set out on the 27th of January, and which had for its object to stretch out towards Thorn, and turn our left wing, has proved exceedingly fatal to them. It has cost the enemy from twelve to fifteen thousand prisoners, as many in killed and missing, forty-five pieces of artillery, and eighteen standards.

On the 9th of February, the Russians were pursued as far as the river Trischeling, while they retreated behind the Pregel. The French Gazette says in conclusion, "This expedition is ended. The enemy is beaten and driven back eighty leagues from the Vistula. The French army is going to return to its winter quarters."

Thus by a series of successive actions, the Russians had been driven back by the French as far as Eylau, and the day after the battle, beyond the Pregel. The French had buried the Russian dead; collected and taken care of the greatest part of their wounded, taken a number of their cannon dismounted in the action; and, finally, remained seven or eight days on the field of battle. This circumstance alone proves, notwithstanding what may have been asserted to the contrary in the Petersburg Gazettes, that the French remained masters of the field, and that they had entirely discomfited the most numerous and best appointed army ever sent out by any emperor of Russia (l).

It is a very remarkable circumstance, in the dreadful battle of Eylau, that there was but little engagement between the infantry of the two armies. The battle was chiefly fought by the artillery and cavalry. The day after the battle presented a horrid scene of dead and dying men: to bury all the dead, required immense labour. A great number of Russian slain, were found with the insignia of their orders. Forty-eight hours after the battle, there were still upwards of five hundred wounded Russians, whom the French had not been able to carry off. Brandy and bread were carried to them, and they were successively carried to the ambulance, or train of carriages. On the space of a square league were seen nine or ten thousand dead bodies; four or five thousand horses killed; whole lines of Russian knapsacks; broken pieces of muskets and sabres; the ground covered with cannon-balls, howitzer shells, and ammunition; twenty-four pieces of cannon, near which lay the bodies of their drivers, killed at the moment when they were endeavouring to carry them off. All this was the more conspicuous, as the ground was covered with snow. The five hundred wounded Russians were all conveyed in sledges to Thorn, and to the French hospitals, on the left bank of the Vistula. The surgeons observed with astonishment, that the fatigue of this conveyance did no harm to the wounded.

After the battle of Eylau, Napoleon, according to his usual policy on all great occasions, dispatched Bertrand, a general of division, to the Russian commander in chief with overtures of a pacific nature; but general Bennigsen replied, that he had been sent by his master not to negociate, but to fight. Bertrand was then ordered to proceed from Konigsberg to Memel, with similar overtures to the king of Prussia, with whom he had not greater success than with the Russian chief.

On the 15th of February, general Von Essen, at the head of twenty-five thousand men, advanced to Ostrolenka, and at the village of Flakis Lawowa met the advanced guard of general Savary, who commanded the fifth corps of the French army. At Ostrolenka the French permitted the Russians to get fairly within the town, as far as half the length of the streets; when they were charged by the French with fixed bayonets. Thrice did the Russians make an attack on the French, and were as often repulsed, leaving the streets covered with the dead. Their loss was so great, that they were compelled to abandon the town, and take a position behind the sand hills which cover it. The divisions of generals Souchet and Oudinot advanced, and at noon the head of their columns arrived at Ostrolenka. General Oudinot, at the head of the cavalry, made a successful charge, and cut in pieces the Cossacks of the Russian rear-guard. At length the Russians gave way on all sides, and were followed fighting for three leagues. The loss of the Russians was one thousand three hundred killed, among whom were two generals, above one thousand two hundred taken, seven pieces of cannon, and two standards; but the loss of the French was very trifling in comparison with that of the Russians.

A division of one of the French corps marched to Marienwerder, where were seven Prussian squadrons: these were attacked and routed, and three hundred men with two hundred and fifty horses taken. The rest of the Prussians making their escape, took refuge in Dantzig.

The Russians, however, seemed determined to give the French no rest; accordingly, they engaged the French in a variety of skirmishes, in which the Russians were always great losers. On the 28th of February, the French attacked the Russians at Braunsberg, who were ten thousand strong, and overthrew them with fixed bayonets, drove them from the town, and took sixteen pieces of cannon, two stands of colours, and made two thousand prisoners. Thus in the several engagements of Pultusk and Golymin, Bergfried, Allenstein, Deppen, Hoff, Eylau, Ostrolenka, and Braunsberg, the French took one hundred and seventy-five pieces of cannon.

Bonaparte was now at leisure to push the siege of Dantzig, and trenches were opened before it on the night between the 2nd and 3rd of April. But it was necessary, for carrying on the siege, to bring battering cannon from the fortresses of Silesia, upwards of three hundred miles. Part of this artillery arrived on the 12th, and the remainder on the 24th (m).

The force that lay before Dantzig was between thirty and forty thousand men; the place being defended by double, and, in some places, by triple rows of fortifications, by marshy ground, and a garrison of twelve thousand Prussians and six thousand Russians: the whole under the command of the Prussian general Kalkreuth. Notwithstanding this immense garrison, the siege was pushed on with vigour by the besiegers, and the bombardment commenced on the 24th of April.

On the 13th of May, the Russians attacked general Marrois at the mouth of the Bug. This general had passed that river on the 10th with a Bavarian brigade, and a Polish regiment. In the course of three days, he had constructed several têtes-du-pont, and had advanced to Wiskywo, for the purpose of burning the rafts on which the Russians had been at work for six weeks. This expedition completely succeeded, and the foolish work of six weeks was destroyed in a moment.

On the 16th, a Russian division, of six thousand men, under general Turkow, advanced from the Brock to the Bug, and towards Pultusk, with a view to hinder the execution of some new works for strengthening a tête-du-pont. The Russians advanced four times to the attack, and were four times repulsed by grape shot from the different batteries. The Russians, for this attack on Pultusk, had prepared a great number of rafts, in the same manner as they

(l) So little indeed were the Russian accounts, which were given in their gazettes, to be depended upon, that, in order to gain a tolerable acquaintance with the truth, it was necessary to wait for the French accounts, which, though they have been stigmatized as given to exaggeration, have generally proved true in the main.

(m) While Bonaparte was employed in carrying on the siege of Dantzig, the court of St. Petersburgh reckoned on the co-operation of Great Britain, not only in the way of subsidy, but of an army, that should form a junction with the Swedes and Prussian insurgents, and occupy a portion of the French force, by a diversion on their rear. Repeated and earnest applications for an English army of infantry and cavalry were, however, made in vain. A subsidy of five hundred thousand pounds was indeed granted, but no troops were sent from Britain till it was too late; and the force then sent to the Isle of Rugen, in July, (about two months after Dantzig had surrendered,) consisted only of the German legion about eight thousand strong!

had

had done in their attack on the works of general Le Marrois. Those rafts, prepared at so great an expence of time and labour, were burnt in two hours time.

On the 19th of May, when every thing was prepared by marshal Le Febvre, and the French were proceeding to the assault, general Kalkreuth demanded a capitulation; which was dated on the 20th, and carried into execution on the 26th, at twelve o'clock at noon. On the 27th, the garrison marched out of the city with general Kalkreuth at its head (n). Several thousands of artillery horses were given up to the French, according to the terms of capitulation; eight hundred pieces of artillery; magazines of every kind; more than five hundred thousand quintals of grain; well stored cellars; immense collections of cloathing, and spices and great resources of every kind for the army.

Notwithstanding the surrender of Dantzig, the fortress of Weischelmunde still held out; but when mareschal Le Febvre summoned it on the 26th, while the terms were only under consideration, the whole garrison advanced from the fort, and surrendered at discretion. The commandant, thus abandoned by the garrison, saved himself by sea.

After the fall of Dantzig, a detachment was sent, closely to blockade and besiege, in form, the fortress of Graudenz, which, though strong both by nature and art, could not be supposed to hold out long, hemmed in, as it was, on all sides, by the besieging and grand French army.

The last hope that remained to the allies, of a favourable turn to the war, on the western side of the Vistula, was Stralsund. General Mortier, being charged with the siege of Colberg, drew off seven thousand men to that place, leaving the siege of Stralsund in charge to general Granjeau. In the mean time, while the operations of the besiegers were but languid, the besieged made several sorties, demolishing the French batteries, and spiking their guns. The garrison of Stralsund likewise received considerable reinforcements; and troops were also landed at other points from the Swedish flotilla. In the beginning of April, it was thought proper to reinforce the army before Dantzig; the siege of Stralsund was therefore raised, and the besieging army, by degrees, withdrew to the Lower Vistula. So soon as general baron Von Essen, governor-general of Swedish Pomerania, perceived that the French were filing off in small detachments, he determined to march against them, and compel them to abandon their entrenchments, and completely evacuate Pomerania. Accordingly, he divided his forces into two columns, each consisting of eight squadrons of hussars, a detachment of mounted artillery, and four battalions of infantry, with their proper divisions of chasseurs. With these he advanced in the same line of direction, and came up with the French at Lussow, who retreated from one post to another with admirable skill and courage, and effected their retreat in a masterly manner, even according to the Swedish accounts.

After the French had retreated from Swedish Pomerania, the Swedish army occupied a line of positions of very great extent, viz. from the banks of the Oder to the confines of Mecklenberg Strelitz. Mareschal Mortier now determined to bear, with his whole force, on the centre of this dilated line, without giving himself any trouble about the other positions, being convinced, that by a rapid march on the river Peene, which the Swedes had inconsiderately crossed, he could throw them into the utmost confusion and consternation. Having assembled a part of his forces at Passewack on the evening of April 15th, he advanced on the 16th, before break of day, on the road to Anclam, overthrew a Swedish post at Belling, and another at Ferdinandskaff, took four hundred prisoners, and two pieces of cannon, entered Anclam at the same time with the enemy, and made himself master of the bridge on the Peene. Thus a Swedish column commanded by general Cardell was cut off. It remained at Neckermunde when the French were already at Anclam. General Armfeldt, one of the Swedish commanders in chief, was wounded by a grape-shot. All the magazines at Anclam were taken, together with all the Swedish sloops of war and transports, on the lake adjoining to Anclam. The column of general Cardell, which was cut off from the other Swedish troops, was attacked on the 17th, by the general of brigade Veau, near Neckermunde, when it had lost three pieces of cannon, and five hundred men. Another column took possession of Demnin, and made five hundred soldiers prisoners. The Swedes were driven back again behind the river Peene.

General Armfeldt, after informing the baron Von Essen of his having been wounded, and that he had been obliged to make the infantry of his division fall back on Ranzien, retired to Stralsund. It was ordered by Von Essen to march to Grimm, and thereafter to the head quarters of Von Essen, the commander of the other division, and who had now the supreme command of both at Greifswald.

Here, on the 17th of April, he was joined by a detachment of hussars, belonging to the royal guard from Stralsund. Early on the morning of that day, he sent a flag of truce to mareschal Mortier, of twenty-four hours, for the purpose of removing the sick and wounded to hospitals. It was not difficult to persuade the mareschal, who knew how much his master wished to detach Sweden from the cause of the allies, to comply with his request. Soon after noon, the first adjutant of mareschal Mortier arrived with a flag of truce at Griefswald, with an answer to that which had been sent by the Swedish general. Before mid-day of the 18th, another flag of truce arrived from mareschal Mortier, and an early hour fixed for a conference between the two generals at Slatkow, within an English mile and half of Anclam, where an armistice was agreed on, not to be broken without ten days' previous notice. Besides this, which was the principal article, there were others, and these altogether in favour of the French. The Swedes were to restore the isles of Usedom and Wollin, which were to be occupied by the French garrisons, to be sent thither for that purpose, on the day after, that is, on the 20th of April. The line of demarcation between the two armies, was to be the Peene, and the Trebel. But the French were farther to occupy a position beyond the Peene, and behind the barrier of Anclam. During the armistice the Swedes were not to afford succours of any kind, to the towns of Graudenz and Dantzig, nor yet to the troops of any of the powers at war with France or its allies. Towards the end of the same month (April,) mareschal Mortier and general Von Essen, improved the terms of mutual accommodation into a more certain prelude to a permanent peace. It was agreed, April 29th, that none of the parties should resume hostilities without giving a month's previous notice, instead of the ten days fixed by the armistice of the 18th.

When the king of Sweden was informed of the armistice, and the events that led to it in Pomerania, he determined to come thither, and take the affairs of this province, political and military, into his immediate management, and accordingly arrived at Stralsund early in May. The king was satisfied with baron Von Essen, and therefore appointed him governor-general of Pomerania, and decorated him with the grand cross of the Swedish order of the sword. It was supposed that general Armfeldt had acted precipitately, and the king granted him permission to retire. This took place on the 14th of May.

While Gustavus was in Pomerania, he was not a little animated by the arrival of general Clinton at Stralsund, with assurances from the British government of speedy succours both of men and money, the English government being now disposed to act cordially with the confederation against France.

We must now take a retrospective view of our affairs in parliament. The new parliament that had been called in October, assembled, according to appointment, on the 15th of December, 1806, and was opened by commission. The commissioners were the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, the earl of Aylesford, and lord Walsingham. Mr. Abbot was chosen speaker of the house of commons. An address to the throne for the speech, as usual, was moved in both houses, and after a considerable debate, in which the conduct of administration was severely scrutinized, the address was carried.

On the 22nd of December, lord Grenville moved, in the house of lords, the thanks of that house to sir John Stuart, and the officers and soldiers by whose valour the victory of Maida was obtained; and the motion was carried nem. diss. The same day a similar motion was made in the house of commons, by Mr. Windham, and after a just encomium on the valour and intrepidity of the British officers and soldiers, it was agreed to nem. con.

The subject of the negociation between this country and France came under consideration in both houses of par-(n) This strong garrison, which consisted at the commencement of the siege of eighteen thousand men, as above stated, was now reduced to nine thousand, of which number four hundred, and among these some officers, deserted. The reason assigned by the officers was, that they had no inclination to go to Siberia.

liament,

liament, in the beginning of January, 1807, when a long debate took place, wherein the principles on which the British ministry acted during the negociation were examined and commented upon, and an address to his majesty on the subject was carried in both houses.

On the 4th of March, in the house of commons, a conversation approaching to the style of a debate, was entered into on the subject of granting five thousand pounds, in addition to the eight thousand pounds formerly granted to the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth in Ireland. On this occasion Mr. Perceval observed, that the interests of the Protestant university of Dublin were sacrificed to the advancement of the Catholic seminary. Within a few years, he said, the professors of the latter institution had been doubled; there being, instead of the nine original professors, now eighteen. In the university of Dublin, provision was made for only one hundred persons, including the fellows, senior and junior scholars, and singers; whilst the public were called upon to defray the expences of two hundred Roman Catholic professors and students in the college of Maynooth, a class of subjects who, in their religious tenets, withheld from their lawful sovereign the admission of his supremacy. The true and strong source of danger and hostility, he said, lay in the principles in which the Roman Catholics were educated. And lord Mahon observed, that the influence of the Catholic priests in Ireland had been too strongly exemplified by the events of the late rebellion; and, therefore, he could not see any reason for increasing their number. At length, after a few observations from lord Howick and others, the grant was carried.

In the progress of the commission of military enquiry, abuses of very great magnitude were brought to light in the barrack department. It appeared that general Delancy, barrackmaster-general, had been in the habit of drawing, through the medium of Mr. Greenwood, the army agent, immense sums of the public money long before they were wanted; and that in a part only of his accounts, (for there had not been time to examine the whole,) there were over-charges and mis-statements to the amount of no less a sum than ninety thousand pounds.

The report of the commissioners, (being their third,) made early in the present session of parliament, related to Mr. Alexander Davison, banker, and colonel of a regiment of volunteers. This man, who had been lately tried for bribery at elections, and imprisoned for that offence, soon after his coming out of prison, had been made treasurer of the ordnance; an office in which, from three to four millions passed through his hands of the public money. It appeared from the report, that in consequence of a bargain with general Delancey, Davison was to receive a commission of two and a half per cent. for supplying the articles of beds, bedding, sheets, blankets, towels, ironmongery, candles, beer, and forage; but that, as to coals, he was to supply this article as a merchant.

It appeared from the report, that the way in which the public was injured by Davison, was two-fold. First, by following the example of Delancey, in drawing immense sums of money, long before they were expended by him for the public service: he had always in hand a million or more of the public money; of the interest of which he thus deprived the public. Secondly, he imposed on the public in the price of the articles furnished. On this head there did not appear to have been any means of detection afforded, so far as related to the articles furnished on commission: but ample means of detection were found with respect to the coals, and the commissioners did not fail to make a proper use of them. The bargain concerning the coals was this: Davison was to buy the coals on his own account, and to sell them to the barrack office, at the wholesale prices, at the several places where the barracks were situated: and, that these prices might be ascertained in a regular way, Davison was to produce certificates that his prices were fair; these certificates being signed by persons of the most perfect respectability. But it appeared that Delancey had never made any inquiry into the character, or the means of knowledge possessed by the persons who signed Davison's certificates, save in one single instance (o). Had he conceived himself to be under any check or control, it is probable that, in his tricks, he would have been less daring.

In the first place, he charged, in point of measure, as a retailer, not making the allowance always made by wholesale dealers, of one chaldron in twenty: so that, supposing his profits to have been fair, he thus gained one-twentieth part more, than would have been done by a fair wholesale dealer. This, however, was a trifle, compared with what follows. It appears, from a comparative view of the prices which Davison paid, and those which he charged to the government, (and which were paid to him for a course of nine years,) that the average of the price charged to the public, was eighty-one shillings per chaldron; and the average of the price paid by Davison, sixty-one shillings per chaldron; making a difference of twenty-five in the hundred. To this sum, again, must be added, the one chaldron in twenty, which Davison ought to have given in, as the wholesalers do, amounting to five pounds in the hundred more: thus making a gain of thirty pounds in every hundred. Farther still, Davison was bound to make the deliveries in the most favourable seasons; instead of which, he made almost the whole of them in winter, when coals were dearest, though he had bought them at the seasons when coals were cheapest; and that too, through the most shameful and culpable inattention, if not the connivance of general Delancey, with the public money. Many other instances might be adduced, concerning the fraudulent dealing of Mr. Alexander Davison. The wealth that this man accumulated at the expence of the public, must have been immense; nor was he at any pains to shade it from the public eye, but, on the contrary, seemed desirous to display it by the utmost splendour and magnificence (p). In short, he seemed destined to rouse the attention of government to the conduct of their servants, and the agents of its servants.

Lord Henry Petty told the house, that the commissioners of barrack accounts had, very properly, communicated to the lords of the treasury their opinion, that it was necessary that Mr. Davison should produce his cash account with the barrack-master-general. Mr. Davison, after delays, which he endeavoured to excuse, declared his readiness to give such information as to his cash account, as he could give; but stated, at the same time, that his cash account was so mixed with other accounts, that it was impossible he could give a clear view of it. Mr. Robson spoke at some length, and moved for the production of certain papers relative to abuses in the barrack department; but it being apprehended that his motion would interfere with the commissioners already appointed, it was negatived.

The debates on the bill for the abolition of the slave trade, in the house of peers, were long and pointed: earl St. Vincent made a strong declaration against it; but the bill was read a third time and passed; after which it was sent down to the house of commons, where council was heard against it; notwithstanding which it was passed into a law.

On the 16th of April, lord Hawkesbury moved the thanks of the house of peers to sir Samuel Auchmutty, for the capture of Monte Video; and lord Mulgrave moved the thanks of the house to rear-admiral Stirling, and the officers and men under his command; both which motions were agreed to nem. diss. And on the same day similar motions were made in the house of commons; which were likewise agreed to.

On the 27th of April, the parliament was prorogued by a speech from the throne, delivered, in his majesty's name, by the lord chancellor, one of his majesty's commissioners. The other two were lord Hawkesbury, and the earl of Camden. The commissioners had it also in charge to state, that his majesty was anxious to recur to the sense of his people, while the events which had recently taken place were yet fresh in their recollection. Thus ended a very short, but a very busy parliament.

(o) "In the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, the certificates were generally signed by a person of the name of George Richard Walker, a dealer in coals, and who was concerned with Mr. Davison under some agreement or contract, in supplying coals for the barracks in Guernsey and the adjacent islands, for about four years. He was afterwards Mr. Davison's agent for about two years more, in the same business, at a commission of two and a half per cent. on an estimate price of the coals delivered. He was also Mr. Davison's agent in supplying candles during the whole time. This person had, therefore, had a direct interest in certifying high prices: and he had also an interest in the quantity delivered in; for while he acted as Mr. Davison's agent, he received, on an agreed valuation of sixty-five shillings per chaldron, on all the coals measured in the barracks. It was during this period, that the great increase in the cargoes sent to these islands appeared.—Now this George Richard Walker was convicted of perjury and executed." Extracted from the Third Report of the Commission of Military Inquiry.

(p) He was a purchaser of the most valuable pictures, as well as of estates, and was in the habit of giving grand and splendid entertainments not only to the nobility, but to the prince of Wales, and others of the princes.

While

While the British parliament was employed in debates respecting the means of quieting, or of opposing, the growing power of France, Bonaparte pursued his career of conquest, triumphing over the futility of detachments and expeditions sent at various times, to different places, against one compact and mighty power, and the imbecility of confederation; and shewing to all nations, that it is on the direction, not the existence, of military force, that the issue of campaigns, and the fate of empires depends.

On the 5th of June, the grand French army was attacked by the allies at different points of its line. On the right of the allies, and the left of the French, twelve Russian and Prussian regiments, forming two divisions, attacked the tête-du-pont of Spanden on the Passarge, which was defended by a regiment of light infantry, strongly covered by entrenchments and redoubts. They were repulsed seven times, and as often renewed the attack; but immediately after the last assault, they were charged by a regiment of dragoons, that had advanced to the assistance of the regiment of infantry, and forced to abandon the field of battle with a great loss in killed and wounded. Two divisions of the centre of the allied army attacked at the same time the tête-du-pont of Lomitten, which was defended by a brigade of the corps of marshal Soult. The Russian general, with one thousand one hundred fell in the action, and a great many wounded.

The next day, June 6, the allies attacked the 6th corps of the French army, under Soult and Marchant, at Deppen. In this action the Russians lost two thousand killed, and more than three thousand wounded. In short, in the different actions from the 5th to the 12th of June, the Russian army was deprived of about thirty thousand fighting men. The number of wounded left prisoners in the hands of the French, amounted to between three and four thousand. On the 12th, at four in the morning, the French army entered Heilsberg, where they found in the magazines several thousand quintals of grain, and an immense quantity of different kinds of provisions.

On the 14th, the Russians advanced to the bridge of Friedland, with intent to pursue their march to Konigsberg, and at three in the morning a cannonade was heard. "It is a fortunate day," says Bonaparte, "it is the anniversary of the battle of Marengo." Different movements and actions took place, by which the Russians were stopped in their march, and could not pass the village of Postenheim. A mighty struggle was now unavoidable; and both armies prepared for a decisive battle. By five in the evening the several corps of the French were at their appointed stations; and the whole of the Russian army was drawn up in the best order that the place and circumstances would admit. The field of battle lay between the village of Henrichsdorf and the Alla to the south of Friedland.

Bonaparte having reconnoitred the position of the enemy, instantly determined to take the town of Friedland. Then suddenly changing his front, and advancing his right, he commenced the attack with the first part of that wing; the firing of twenty cannon from a battery being the signal for battle. After a most dreadful conflict Friedland was taken, and its streets bestrewed with dead bodies. The field of battle presented one of the most horrible spectacles of wounded, dying, and dead men and horses, that was ever beheld. The number of the dead on the side of the Russians was estimated at from fifteen to eighteen thousand. Eighty cannon, and a great number of covered waggons and standards fell into the hands of the conquerors. The Russians were pursued in their retreat towards Konigsberg till eleven o'clock. During the remainder of the night the cut-off columns endeavoured to pass, and part of them did pass the Alla at several fordable places; but the next day covered waggons, cannon, and harness, were every where seen in the river. "The battle of Friedland," says the French bulletin, "is worthy to be numbered among those of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Jena. The enemy were numerous, had fine cavalry, and fought bravely."

The next day, June 15, the Russians endeavoured to re-assemble on the right bank of the Alla, while the French army manœuvred on the left bank to cut them off from Konigsberg. Almost all the magazines which the Russians had on the Alla, had been thrown into the river, or burnt. At Wehlaw, however, the French found more than six thousand quintals of corn; and the corps under marshal Soult took possession of Konigsberg. At this place were found some hundred thousand quintals of corn, more than twenty thousand wounded Russians and Prussians, and all the ammunition that had been sent to the Russians by England, including one hundred and sixty thousand muskets, that had not been landed (q).

On the 19th of June, Napoleon with his guards entered Tilsit, the second town in Prussia, after Konigsberg, which contained ten thousand inhabitants, and enjoyed a brisk commerce. The Russians, after the battle of Friedland, were pursued by the grand duke of Berg, at the head of the greater part of the light cavalry, and some divisions of dragoons and cuirassiers, so that they were obliged to cross the Niemen, which they effected, burning the bridge of Tilsit, and continuing their retreat to the eastward. The emperor of Russia, who had remained three weeks with his Prussian majesty at Tilsit, left that place along with the king in great haste. The same day, an armistice was proposed to the chiefs of the French army, by the Russian commander-in-chief. In consequence of this proposition, an armistice was agreed on at Tilsit, on the 22d of June, by which it was settled that hostilities should not be resumed on either side without a month's previous notice of such an intention. That a similar armistice should be concluded between the French and the Prussian armies in the course of five days. That plenipotentiaries should be instantly appointed by the different parties, for the salutary work of pacification; and that there should be an immediate exchange of prisoners. The boundary between the French and Russian armies, during the armistice, was the Thalwag, or middle of the stream of the Niemen from the Kurisch-haff, where it falls into the sea, to Grodno: and a line from thence to the confines of Russia, between the Narew and the Bug. Such was the formidable position of the French, while nothing remained to the king of Prussia but the small town and territory of Memel. The first interview between the emperor Napoleon, and the emperor Alexander, took place on the 25th of June, on a raft constructed for the purpose, on the Niemen, where two tents had been prepared for their reception by the French. Alexander and Napoleon landed from their boats at the same time, and embraced each other. It was settled that half the town of Tilsit should be considered as neutral ground, and be occupied by the emperor of Russia, with the officers of his household, and his body-guards.—Great were the mutual courtesies and expressions of kindness and respect that ensued among French, Russians, and Prussians of all ranks: visiting, feasting, and all kinds of entertainment and festivity that could be thought of. Human nature gladly relaxed from the miserable rage of war, and indulged, and was eager to acknowledge, and emphatically to express every sentiment of social and generous affection. A magnificent dinner was given by Napoleon's guards to those of Alexander and the king of Prussia. At this entertainment they exchanged uniforms, and were to be seen in the streets in a motley kind of dress, partly Russian, partly Prussian, and partly French. It is much in the same spirit that the chiefs of so many islands in the South Seas exchange names for a time, with persons to whom they wish to shew friendship, or pay a compliment. A stranger to the ways of Europe, witnessing at Tilsit, such ardent love among those different tongues and nations, from the highest to the lowest, might have wondered what could possibly have impelled such good-natured and tender-hearted people to the most horrid scenes of war and bloodshed.

A treaty of peace was concluded, between his majesty, Napoleon, emperor of the French, and king of Italy, and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, at Tilsit, July 7th. As the contest between Russia and France related not to any direct interests of their own, but wholly to those of their respective allies, there was nothing to be adjusted between these powers on their own account, farther than that there should be henceforth perfect peace and amity between their imperial majesties; that all hostilities between them should immediately cease at all points by sea and land; and, that for this purpose, couriers should be dispatched to their respective generals and other commanders. The great sacrifice to peace was, of course, the kingdom of Prussia, which was reduced at once from the rank of a primary to that of a secondary, at best, power of Europe, and all that had been done for the augmentation and aggrandizement of the monarchy by the great Frederick in the course of twenty years, undone in one day. The king of Prussia, by the peace of Tilsit, together with an immense territory, lost near the half of his yearly revenues, and five millions of his subjects. On the whole, Prussia was brought back nearly to the state in which it was on the 1st of January, 1772, before the first partition of Poland. The greater part of those provinces which, on that day, formed a part of the kingdom of Poland, and had since, at different times, been subjected to Prussia, where annexed to his majesty the king of Saxony, with power of possession and sovereignty, under the title of the duchy of Warsaw, and was to be governed according to a new constitution or system of fundamental laws, that should secure the liberties and privileges of the people of the said duchy, and be consistent with the security of the neighbouring states.—This constitution, framed on the model of that of France, was presented, approved by Napoleon, by the grace of God and the constitution, emperor of the French, king of Italy, and protector of the confederation of the Rhine, and signed by him, and countersigned by his secretary of state, Maret, at Dresden, so early as the 22d of July. The city of Dantzig, with a territory of two leagues around it, was restored to her former independence, under the protection of his majesty the king of Prussia, and his majesty the king of Saxony, to be governed by the laws by which she was governed at the time when she ceased to be her own mistress. For a communication between the kingdom of Saxony and the duchy of Warsaw, his majesty the king of Saxony was to have the free use of a military road through the states of his majesty the king of Prussia: this road, the number of troops to be allowed to pass at once, and the resting places with magazines, to be fixed by a particular agreement between the two sovereigns, under the mediation of France. Neither his majesty the king of Prussia, his majesty the king of Saxony, nor the city of Dantzig, were to oppose any obstacles whatever to the free navigation of the Vistula, under the name of tolls, rights, or duties. In order, as far as possible, to establish a natural boundary between Russia and the duchy of Warsaw, a certain territory, heretofore under the dominion of Prussia, to be for ever united to the empire of Russia.—This territory added two hundred thousand subjects to those of the Russian empire.—Their royal highnesses, the dukes of Saxe Cobourg, Oldenburg, and Mecklenburgh Schwerin, were each of them to be restored to the complete and quiet possession of their estates: but the ports in the duchies of Oldenburgh to remain in the possession of French garrisons till a definitive treaty should be signed between France and England: for accomplishing which, the mediation of Russia was to be accepted, on the condition that this mediation should be accepted by England in one month after the ratification of the present treaty. Until the ratification of a definitive treaty of peace between France and England, all the ports of Prussia, without exception, to be shut against the English. His majesty the emperor of all the Russias, acknowledged the confederation of the Rhine; his majesty Joseph Napoleon, king of Naples; his majesty Lewis Napoleon, king of Holland; and his imperial highness prince Jerome Napoleon, as king of Westphalia: a kingdom to consist of the provinces ceded by the king of Prussia on the left bank of the Elbe, and other states then in the possession of his majesty the emperor Napoleon. These were the most generally important articles in the treaties. There were others relating to private estates and other property, more interesting, no doubt, to individuals. The time and manner in which the different stipulations in the treaties were to be carried into execution, were fixed in a special convention between France and Prussia.

(q) The seventy-ninth bulletin of the French concludes thus: "It was on the 5th of June that the enemy renewed hostilities. Their loss in the ten days that followed their first operations may be reckoned at sixty thousand men, killed, wounded, taken, or otherwise put hors de combat. They have lost a part of their artillery, almost all their ammunition, and the whole of their magazines on a line of more than forty leagues. The French armies have seldom obtained such great advantages with such little loss."

The young king of Sweden was now the only potentate on the continent of Europe that refused to submit to the dominion of Napoleon. On the 18th of July an armistice was concluded between the Swedish and French generals at Skatklow, to be continued till ten days should be expired after notice of an intention to renew hostilities; which term of ten days was afterwards, by an additional article, extended to thirty. But the king of Sweden having himself assumed the command of his army in Pomerania, immediately declared his intention to acknowledge only the first stipulation, of a term of ten days. In the mean time, notwithstanding the armistice, the Swedish navy held all the ports in the Baltic, in the possession, or under the influence of France in the strictest blockade, and carried on hostilities at the mouth of the Trave, and against the corps of French and Germans besieging Colberg. Remonstrances were made on this subject, a correspondence ensued about the meaning and terms of the armistice, and, at the king of Sweden's request, a conference was held between his majesty and marshal Brune at Skatklow, which lies within the Swedish territory. The marshal being admitted to the presence of the king, after a short silence, said, "I am come here by order of your majesty." The king immediately told him, that he wanted to speak with the marshal himself, that they might come to a clear understanding respecting the additional article of the armistice at Skatklow, and declared his unalterable resolution to abide only by the armistice. The conversation after this, turned on the general situation of affairs in France, and other topics relative to Louis XVIII. in which the Swedish monarch endeavoured to shake the allegiance of marshal Brune; but he quickly found that he had mistaken his man, and that, to the strictest honour and fidelity, he united firmness in the cause he had espoused, with quick recollection and good sense. He, however, treated his Swedish majesty with respect.

From the first day of the king's arrival at Stralsund, he had been indefatigable in his exertions for improving the fortifications of that place, and for the erection of new works on the isle of Rugen. His army at Stralsund consisted of about thirteen thousand Swedes, and four thousand Prussians, and he was in expectation of being soon joined by a large force from England.

At Putt, a town of Anterior Pomerania, eight miles S. S. W. from Stralsund, the Swedes were attacked in their entrenchments by a corps of the grand army of observation under marshal Brune. The Swedes bore no proportion in point of numbers to the assailants, but they made an obstinate resistance. The loss of the French, or rather of their German and Dutch allies, was computed at two thousand four hundred killed and wounded; that of the Swedes to one thousand five hundred: so that, considering the magnitude of the respective armies, and the Swedes being in their entrenchments, the loss on the part of the latter was by far greater than that on the side of the former. The Swedes, however, were driven under the walls of Stralsund. The Swedish army now found itself reduced to the necessity of evacuating Stralsund, which it did on the 19th and 20th of August, after destroying their magazines, spiking their cannon, and breaking their carriages, which they threw into the ditches. The same day (the 20th) an aid-de-camp presented himself at the out-posts of the French, and announced, that at any hour that should be appointed, a Swedish officer, general Peyron, would attend general Brune, with some proposals relative to the fortress of Stralsund, and that, in the mean time, there should be a cessation of hostilities for twenty-four hours. The aid-de-camp was received by general Reille, and it was agreed on, that marshal Brune should see general Peyron at six o'clock in the evening. At the appointed time deputies from the senate of Stralsund arrived at the French out-posts, and in a little time thereafter general Peyron. Articles of capitulation were then speedily adjusted, and the French took possession of the place.

Early on the 20th, all the troops and stores were safely landed on the isle of Rugen, where eight thousand Germans, in British pay, had arrived some weeks before, under the command of lord Cathcart, but were by this time employed in another part of the Baltic. The small Swedish army capitulated early in September, and all the islands on the German coast of the Baltic were included in the capitulation.

We now advert to the affairs of Turkey as connected with England. Mr. Arbuthnot, the English minister at the Porte, had observed, that ever since the great victories obtained by the French over the Prussians, the influence of the French at Constantinople had increased, and that of England and Russia had proportionably diminished: he therefore wrote an account of the state of affairs at that place, which he sent home to the English government. Intelligence to the same purport as that which had been transmitted by Mr. Arbuthnot, was sent by the Russian ministers to the British government, accompanied with a recommendation to send a British fleet, with a large military force, which might defeat the ascendancy of the French counsels at the Porte, and cause a powerful diversion of the force of France in favour of Russia. A negociation ciation for peace with the Porte was then entered into by the Russian in conjunction with the English government. To give weight to this, a fleet under the command of sir John Duckworth, was sent to force the passage of the Dardanelles, and, if certain terms should not be acceded to by the Turkish government, to bombard Constantinople. The fleet consisted of seven ships of the line, besides frigates and bomb ships. Two of the ships of the line were three-deckers, three carried eighty-four guns, and two seventy-four. This naval force cast anchor at the isle of Tenedos, about the middle of February, where it was joined by the frigate on board of which Mr. Arbuthnot had made his escape from the personal violence of which he had been in apprehension at Constantinople. Our fleet passed the Dardanelles on the morning of the 19th. A Turkish squadron, consisting of a sixty-four gun ship, four frigates, and several corvettes, had been for some time at anchor within the inner castles. Orders were given to commodore sir Sydney Smith, who was well acquainted with those seas, to bear up with three ships of the line, and destroy them, if any opposition should be made to their passage. This division was followed closely by the other ships; the whole of the squadron, therefore, passed the outer castles, receiving the Turkish fire, which, however, did but little damage to the English ships. But in passing the narrow strait, between Sestos and Abydos, our squadron sustained a very heavy fire from both castles. The small Turkish squadron within the inner castles, was attacked by sir Sydney Smith, driven on shore, and burnt; and the guns of a formidable battery, to the number of more than thirty, on a point of land which our squadron had yet to pass, called Point Pesquiez, were spiked by a detachment of marines.

On the 20th of February, in the evening, the English squadron came to anchor near the Isles of Princes, at the distance of eight miles from Constantinople; when a strange and almost ridiculous process took place, on the part of the English minister and admiral, a sort of menacing courtship—menacing war, and courting the Turks to pacific measures. After which the admiral, having previously apprized the Turkish government, moved the squadron four miles nearer the city, but still kept without cannon shot. Threats were intermixed with tokens of amity. While the Turks detained in close custody five seamen belonging to the Endymion, that had fallen into their hands, having gone to some distance from the frigate in the long boat, he sent back to the seraglio some Turks that had been seized in the act of committing hostilities against the English.

In the mean time, the fortifications, of which the English complained, were not interrupted, but continued, night and day, with unremitted activity and vigour, at many different points, and on both the European and Asiatic sides of the canal of Constantinople. The flames of the small Turkish squadron destroyed on the 19th of February, by sir Sydney Smith, did not intimidate the Turks, but roused and united them in a determination to resist aggression, and to preserve the city from destruction, and the contamination of infidels. The grand signior himself, conducted by the French ambassador, general Sebastiani, appeared at the places most proper for the construction of redoubts and batteries. Men, women, and children, Turks, Armenians, Greeks, Ulemas, Sheikhs, and Dervises, lent their aid. The Greek patriarch, and a number of his clergy, put their hands to the pick-ax and wheel-barrow. Thousands of workmen flocked from different quarters. The works were carried on under the direction of certain officers of the corps of engineers, and of artillery that had arrived opportunely from Dalmatia. The members of the divan, and other grandees, remained on the busy scene night and day, each of them at one battery, for encouraging the labouring people, and forwarding the work. They took the necessary repose in small tents. The grand signior too slept in a tent; and every day made the round of all the batteries, encouraging the workmen by kind looks and words, and the distribution of money. At the end of four days, batteries, with excellent breast-works, were mounted with five hundred pieces of cannon, and one hundred mortars.

While the whole line of coast presented a chain of batteries, twelve Turkish line of battle ships, two of them three deckers, and nine frigates filled with troops, lay in the canal, with their sails bent, and apparently ready for action. Two hundred thousand men, destined to march against the Russians, were said to be in the city and suburbs; and an innumerable quantity of gun-boats and sloops, converted into fire-ships, were also prepared to act against the invaders.

Sir J. Duckworth was of opinion, that the Turks were inclinable at first to treat for peace; but he now began to change his mind, and apprehended, that if the English were compelled to contend against the force which the Turks had been preparing, it was become extremely doubtful whether they would ever be able to repass the Dardanelles. The fire of the two inner castles on our ships in their inward passage had been severe, but the effects they had on them, in their return, proved them to have been doubly formidable. Bullets, or blocks of marble, of immense weight and size, were fired at our ships, from huge mortars. One of these, weighing eight hundred pounds, cut the main-mast of the Windsor man of war in two, and it was not without much trouble and pains that the ship was saved. Those masses, however, being easily discovered in their course, our men avoided them on their approach, by stepping aside, and opening a clear way for their passage. Our loss of men in this unfortunate expedition, amounted, in killed and wounded, to about two hundred and fifty. Of this number twenty-six were killed or wounded in a fruitless attempt, February 27, to dislodge the Turks from the isle of Prota, very near the place where our fleet, after passing the strait, had cast anchor; and where they had begun to construct a battery, that might have greatly annoyed our squadron (r). The British squadron repassed the Dardanelles on the morning of the 1st of March.

The failure of our attempt on the capital of the Turkish empire seemed for some little time to have been compensated by the possession of Alexandria. On the 6th of March, a military force of about five thousand men, including three companies of artillery, with two engineers, was sent against that city, by general Fox, from Messina, under the command of major-general Mackenzie. On the night of the 17th, the Apollo frigate, with nineteen transports, out of thirty-three, which conveyed the troops, parted company, and the other fourteen, with the Tigre, came to an anchor to the westward of Alexandria, on the 16th. When our squadron approached the land, a vessel was dispatched by major Misset, who appears to have resided at Alexandria, in the character of British consul, and with whom the general was directed by his instructions to consult as to the best plan of operations, with a letter to him, stating, that the major had not come off himself, thinking his presence in Alexandria absolutely necessary, to counteract the intrigues of the French consul, who was endeavouring to prevail upon the government to admit a body of Albanians from Rosetta, to assist in the defence of the place. And he earnestly recommended to the general, to land the troops immediately, as the inhabitants were well affected to the English, and expressed his sanguine hopes that they should be able to get possession of the city, without firing a shot. The general stated the diminution of his force, in consequence of the separation of the nineteen transports. The major still urged his immediate landing. The troops were landed, part on the 17th, part on the 18th. He then moved forward, about eight o'clock in the evening of the 18th. In their way, the British forced a pallisadoed entrenchment, with a deep ditch in front of it, that had been thrown up as a defence against the Mamalukes and Arabs, on the western side, stretching from Fort des Bains, on its right flank, mounting thirteen guns. This they effected with very little loss, though under a heavy fire of cannon and musketry, and proceeded within a few yards of Pompey's gate, where they found the garrison prepared to receive them, the gate barricadoed, and the walls lined with troops and armed inhabitants. This, added to the smallness of the British force, not much exceeding one thousand, determined the general to proceed to the westward. In the morning of the 19th, he took up his position on the ground which the British troops had occupied in the action of the 21st of March, 1801, immediately sending detachments to take possession of Aboukir Castle, and cut between the lakes Maadie, and Mareotis, by which communication the reinforcement of Albanians was expected in Alexandria. In both these designs they succeeded.

(r) The demonstrations of sir J. Duckworth, as might easily have been foreseen, produced an effect diametrically opposite to what was intended. He co-operated with the address of general Sebastiani, to bring the Turkish government, for a time wholly under the influence of France, and under that influence to make peace with Russia, when Russia also had declared herself against England.

succeeded. The next day, the 20th, the general sent in by a friendly Arab, that had stolen out of the town, and joined the English, a manifesto addressed to the inhabitants, warning them of the danger of an assault, in the horrors of which, friends would be involved with foes, and urging them to force the government to capitulate. This had the desired effect. A truce was agreed to and signed. The garrison of Alexandria, before its surrender, consisted in four hundred and sixty-seven men, soldiers, gunners, sailors, and marines. The loss of the British, in this reduction of Alexandria, was no more than one officer, six rank and file killed; one officer, one serjeant, eight rank and file wounded. The Apollo, with the nineteen missing transports, came to anchor in Aboukir bay, on the morning of the 20th; and sir John Duckworth's squadron arrived there on the 22d.

In consequence of a strong representation by major Misset, that the inhabitants of Alexandria ran a risk of being starved, unless Rosetta and Rhamine were occupied by British troops, general Fraser, with the concurrence of admiral sir John Duckworth, March 27th, detached the thirty-first regiment, and the chasseurs Britanniques, amounting together, to about one thousand five hundred, under major-general Wauchope, and brigadier-general Meade, for that purpose. Our troops took possession of the heights of Abermandour, which command the town of Rosetta, without any loss. But the general, instead of keeping his post there, penetrated with his whole force into the town, without any previous examination of it, when our men were so briskly fired on, and otherwise annoyed, from the windows and tops of houses, without ever seeing their enemy, that after a loss of about three hundred men, in killed and wounded, they retired, in good order to Aboukir, without molestation, from whence they were directed to return to Alexandria. Apprehensions of famine being still strongly declared both by our resident, major Misset, and the forbagi, or chief magistrate, in the name of the people, without the occupation of Rosetta, another corps, about two thousand five hundred strong, was sent for the reduction of this important place, under the command of the honourable brigadier-general Stewart, and colonel Oswald. This force took post opposite the Alexandrian gate of Rosetta, on the 9th of April, and after a summons to the town to surrender, was treated with defiance, began to form their batteries. Great stress had been laid by the British commander, on assistance promised by the Mamalukes, and their appearance was now daily, or even hourly expected. No succour, however, after an anxious expectation of many days, nor intelligence of any succour was received. Early on the morning of the 22d of April, sixty or seventy vessels were seen sailing down the Nile, and there could not be a doubt that this was a reinforcement sent to the enemy, from Cairo. Orders were immediately dispatched to colonel Macleod to retreat from his position to the main body; but these orders were unfortunately intercepted. The detachment at Elhammed was completely cut off. General Stewart, overpowered by so large a force, retreated, fighting all the way to Alexandria. Our loss in this unfortunate enterprize, was not less than one thousand men, in killed, wounded, and missing.

Generals Mackenzie and Fraser, being now threatened with expulsion, by the disaffection of the inhabitants, and a formidable force of infantry and cavalry, on its march from Cairo, against Alexandria, abandoned the idea of making any defence. On the approach of the enemy, he sent out a flag of truce, announcing that, on the condition of the delivery of the British prisoners, the army under his command should immediately evacuate Egypt: which condition was accepted without hesitation. The British troops, setting sail from Alexandria, on the 23d of September, returned to Sicily: where they set free a part of our troops stationed there for the protection of that island. The troops thus liberated, were brought to Gibraltar, with a view to co-operate in securing the retreat of the royal family of Portugal, from Lisbon; which was effected without the necessity of employing them.

The expedition to Alexandria, was more generally censured, as silly and childish, than even that against Constantinople; because it tended to throw the Turks into the hands of the French. Though the bravery, the discipline, and the perseverance of the British troops, were as conspicuous as they had ever been, yet the capitulation of Alexandria, a defeat in Egypt, where the achievements of our countrymen redounded so much to the glory of the nation, was a source of melancholy impressions.

We have now to record another disastrous expedition, which was still more unfortunate than those against Constantinople and Alexandria: we allude to that undertaken by sir Home Popham against the Spanish settlements on the Rio de la Plata in South America, for which he was tried by a court-martial held in March 1807; when it was declared to be highly reprehensible in a British officer, and leading to a subversion of all military discipline, as well as subordination to government; and he was reprimanded accordingly.

As we have before mentioned the particulars of the expedition to the Rio de la Plata, it is unnecessary to recapitulate them; we shall therefore take notice only of the operations in that quarter which were performed this year. On the 2nd of February, it was reported that a breach made in the walls of Monte Video was practicable, and orders were issued for the attack an hour before day-break on the ensuing morning. A summons was sent in the evening of the preceding day to surrender the town; but no answer was returned. At the appointed time our troops marched to the assault: when they were discovered, a destructive fire was opened from every gun that could bear upon them, as well as from the musketry of the garrison. During the night, which was extremely dark, the Spaniards had barricadoed the breach with hides, so as to render it nearly unperceivable. The head of the column missed the breach; and when it was approached, it was so shut up that it was mistaken for the untouched wall; notwithstanding which we obtained possession of the town by day-light. The number of British troops employed in the reduction of Monte Video was four thousand, and our loss was six hundred. Fresh forces were sent under general Craufurd, which arrived at La Plata on the 14th of June; so that the whole of the British forces was now computed at nine thousand five hundred men. After this general Whitelocke was sent, as commander in chief, with an additional force of one thousand six hundred and thirty men; of which there was a troop of horse artillery to the number of one hundred and thirty, dismounted, with harness and appointments. General Whitelocke arrived in La Plata on the 9th of May. On the 11th, he took the command of the forces; and, on the 28th of June, seven thousand eight hundred and twenty-two men, assembled near Ensenada Le Barrag, after some fatiguing marches through a country much intersected by swamps and deep muddy rivulets, the army reached Reduction, a village about nine miles distant from the bridge over the Rio Chuâlo, on the opposite bank of which, the enemy had constructed batteries, and established a formidable line of defence. The next day, general Whitelocke, with the main body of the army, advanced, and each division was ordered to proceed along the streets directly in its front, till it arrived at the last square of the houses next the river Plata; of which square it was to take possession, forming on the flat roofs, and there wait for further orders. The whole of the troops were unloaded, and no firing was to be permitted until the columns had reached their final points and formed. A cannonade in the central streets was to be the signal for the whole to come forward. The issue of the conflict which ensued, in July, 1807, was such as was to be expected from a plan so weak and ludicrous (s).

In

(s) The British troops moving forward in the appointed order, with their unloaded muskets and iron crows, were assailed by a heavy and continued shower of musketry, hand-grenades, bricks, and stones, from the tops of the windows of the houses, the doors of which were barricadoed in so strong a manner, as to render it almost impossible to force them. The streets were intersected by deep ditches; and cannon planted on the inside of these, poured vollies of grape-shot on our advancing columns. They were saluted also with grape-shot at the corners of all the streets. Every householder, with his negroes, defended his own dwelling, which was in itself a fortress. Yet, in the midst of all this assailance, and while the male population of Buenos Ayres, by the means of destruction just mentioned, was employed in its defence, sir S. Auchmuty, after a most spirited and vigorous attack, in which his brigade suffered much from grape-shot and musketry, made himself master of the Plaza de Toros, took eighty-two pieces of cannon, an immense quantity of ammunition, and six hundred prisoners; which served as a place of refuge to some other regiments that were overpowered by the enemy. Brigadier-general Craufurd with his brigade, being cut off from all communication with any of the other columns, was obliged to surrender: so also was lieutenant colonel Duff, with a detachment under his command. Still, however, the result of this day's action left general Whitelocke in possession of the Plaza de Toros, a strong post on the enemy's right, and the Residentia, another strong post on his left; whilst general Whitelocke himself occupied an advanced post on his centre.

But

In consequence of the transactions on the Rio de la Plata, at a general court-martial, held at the hospital of Chelsea, on the 28th of January, 1808, and continued by adjournments until the 18th of March, lieutenant-general John Whitelocke was tried upon four different charges; the result of which was, "That the said lieutenant general Whitelocke be cashiered, and declared totally unfit and unworthy to serve his majesty in any military capacity whatever." This sentence was confirmed by the king, who gave orders that it should be read at the head of every regiment in his service, and inserted in all regimental orderly books, with a view of its becoming a lasting memorial of the fatal consequences to which officers expose themselves, who, in the discharge of the important duties confided to them, are deficient in that zeal, judgement, and personal exertion, which their sovereign and their country have a right to expect from officers entrusted with high commands.

After the peace of Tilsit, all the continent of Europe lay prostrate at the feet of France; but the island of Great Britain still defied the power of Napoleon; and as the English were superior to him at sea, it was against the commercial interests of this country that he now turned his thoughts. In order, therefore, to shut out the English commerce from the continent of Europe, he had recourse to a decree, dated Hamburgh, November 11, 1806, and another at Milan, dated December 27, declaring the whole island of Great Britain to be in a state of blockade, and prohibiting and compelling all the other continental powers, even Portugal for a time, to prohibit commerce with any of the dominions of his Britannic majesty, excluding thereby all articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain and its dependent territories. In consequence of these decrees, the continental trade of this country was brought to the very brink of destruction, and our Gazettes exhibited amazing lists of bankrupts in every part of the kingdom. At length the British government, with a view to counteract the decrees against English commerce, published an order of council on the 7th of January, 1807; but this was evaded, and tended to the advantage of the enemy, by carrying on a circuitous trade to this country. Therefore new orders of council were issued on the 11th and 21st of November, allowing neutrals to trade with countries not at peace with Great Britain, on condition of their touching at the ports of this country, and paying the customs or taxes imposed by the British government. The neutrals were thus placed between confiscation and confiscation. If they went to an enemy's port, without first paying duty here, they were to be captured by our cruizers; and if they came here and paid the duty, then they would be confiscated if they went to the ports of the enemy. Thus was an effectual stab given to our commercial interests; and our manufacturing towns (such as Birmingham, Sheffield, Manchester, &c. &c.) were reduced to the greatest misery and distress. The journeymen were thrown out of employ, their families were starving, the workhouses became filled with the poor, and the prisons with debtors.

On the western side of the Atlantic, the island of Curaçoa, was taken by a squadron of British frigates, commanded by captain Brisbane, under the orders of vice-admiral Dacres, with the loss of only three men killed and fourteen wounded.

And our affairs in the East Indies were likewise prosperous, in a victory obtained over Dundie Khan, on the 10th of December, 1807.

We have before mentioned the dissolution of the short parliament, in April, 1807, and the new parliament was opened with the accustomed formalities, on the 22nd of June, when Mr. Abbot was re-elected speaker of the house of commons. The first four days were employed in administering the prescribed oaths to the members, and his majesty's speech was delivered on the 26th. The principal transactions of this session were, adopting measures for obviating the inconveniences respecting private bills, arising from the late dissolution of parliament; the appointment of a new committee of finance; discussion of the particulars of the army and navy estimates; new military plan for recruiting and re-inforcing the army; debates on the Irish arms and insurrection bills; a motion and debates thereupon for discovering to the public what sinecure places, pensions, &c. were held by members of parliament; debates on a bill against granting offices in reversion, which was thrown out in the house of lords; after which, the house of commons voted an address to his majesty, on the subject of granting places in reversion; and, lastly, notice was given of a motion intended to be made early in the next session of parliament, against places in reversion. On the 14th of August, a speech was delivered, in the house of lords, by the lord chancellor, in his majesty's name to both houses of parliament, and the parliament was prorogued to the 24th of September.

We have now to advert to the expedition from Great Britain against Denmark, a circumstance which gave great umbrage to some, and was highly extolled by others. It was apprehended by the British cabinet, that the measures adopted by Bonaparte, tended to hostilities with Denmark, in the event of which it was supposed, that that country would not be able to stand against his gigantic power; to obviate which a sort of negociation and correspondence by letter, was carried on between Great Britain and Denmark.

At length, the British government determined to send to sea a powerful military and naval armament, consisting of about twenty thousand men, and a fleet of twenty-seven sail of the line, and vessels of all other descriptions, to the number of near ninety pendants: but such had been the secrecy attending these preparations, that the whole force was nearly ready for sea, before the extent of it was known to the public, and it had actually sailed from England many days before its destination was even suspected. The British army accompanied the main body of the fleet to the Sound, where it was reinforced by the troops that had been for some time employed at Stralsund and the isle of Rugen, as auxiliaries to the king of Sweden. Lord Cathcart, who was with these troops, was appointed to the chief command of the whole land forces; admiral Gambier, one of the lords of the admiralty, commanded the fleet.

This armament was to remain inactive till the issue of a negociation with the court of Denmark was known. Mr. Jackson, who left England on the 1st, and arrived at Kiel on the 6th of August, was instructed to demand of the prince royal of Denmark the delivery of the Danish fleet into the possession of the British admiral, under the most solemn stipulation that it should be restored at the conclusion of the war between this country and France: but in case the prince royal refused to comply, he was to be informed, that the British commanders would forthwith proceed to hostilities.

When Mr. Jackson had an audience with the prince, the prince is said to have argued upon the proposals made to him with dignity, and in terms of strong, but decorous resistance, and finally to have declared his determination to reject them, and to adhere to the line of policy which he had hitherto pursued. Mr. Jackson was informed the next day that the prince had set out for Copenhagen, upon which Mr. Jackson resolved to follow him, and arrived at the capital on the 12th of August, but as he found no signs of his request being complied with on the 14th, the next morning the British commanders were informed that all hope of a friendly accommodation had been frustrated, and that they were at liberty to proceed in their operations according to the instructions with which they were for that case provided.

The English army accordingly landed without opposition, at the village of Vedbeck, on the morning of the 16th of August; and, after some ineffectual attempts of the enemy, to annoy its left wing, by the fire of their gun-boats, and to impede its progress by sallies which were always repulsed with loss, it closely invested the town on the land side. The fleet removing to an advanced anchorage, formed an impenetrable blockade by sea; at the same time a proclamation was issued by the commanders, notifying to the inhabitants of Zealand the motives of their undertaking; the conduct that would be observed towards them; and an assurance that at any time when the demand of his Bri-

But these advantages had cost about two thousand five hundred men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. This was the situation of our army on the morning of the 6th of July, when general Linieres addressed a letter to the British commander, offering to give up all his prisoners taken in the late affair, together with the seventy-first regiment, and others taken with brigadier-general Beresford, on the condition of his desisting from any further attack on the town, and withdrawing his majesty's forces from the river Plata; intimating, at the same time, that, from the exasperated state of the populace, he could not answer for the safety of the prisoners if he persisted in offensive operations. General Whitelocke, influenced by this consideration (which, he says, he knew from better authority to be founded in fact), and reflecting of how little advantage would be the possession of a country, the inhabitants of which were so absolutely hostile, resolved to forego the advantages which the bravery of his troops had obtained, and acceded to a treaty of peace, on the basis that had been proposed by the Spanish commander.

tannic majesty should be acceded to, hostilities should cease.

On the evening of the 2d of September, the land batteries, and the bomb and mortar vessels, opened a tremendous fire upon the town, and with such effect that in the course of a very short time, a general conflagration appeared to have taken place. The fire was returned but feebly from the ramparts of the town, and from the citadel and crown batteries. On the night of the 3d, the British fire was considerably slackened. This had been variously accounted for, some supposing that it was owing to the great expenditure of ammunition on the preceding night, and the apprehension that enough would not remain for the prosecution of the siege: others, that the British general expected that the impression already made, would produce proposals for capitulation. It was probably because the enemy adopted the first of these suppositions, that the second was not realized: they on the contrary conceived some hope, and were encouraged in their resistance, by the relaxation of our fire, which was however resumed with so much vigour and effect on the night of the 4th, that the next morning a trumpeter appeared at the British out posts with a letter from the commandant of the town, containing the proposal of a truce for twenty-four hours, to give time to negociate a capitulation which he was willing to conclude on the basis of no British troops being admitted within the city of Copenhagen. It should seem, however, either that that basis was not at first considered as admissible, or that it was accompanied by some other objectionable condition: for we find, that the capitulation was not signed until three days afterwards, viz. the 8th of September, when the British army took possession of the citadel, dock-yards, and batteries, dependent upon them. The British admiral immediately began rigging and fitting out the ships that filled the spacious basons where they were laid up in ordinary, and at the expiration of the term limited in the capitulation, they were all, together with the stores, timber, and every article of naval equipment, found in the arsenal, and store-houses, conveyed to England, where, with the exception of one line of battle ship, that grounded on the isle of Huen, and was destroyed, they all arrived safely in the close of the month of October.

It was understood that the capitulation was not altogether approved by his majesty's government, and it must be evident to every body, that the officers who concluded it, unless they did so in virtue of specific instructions, assumed powers that could belong to no commanders. In the capitulation, no notice whatever was taken of the large quantity of shipping and naval stores that were in the merchants docks; the consequence of which neglect was, that we had scarcely left the waters of Copenhagen, before a considerable number of armed vessels was prepared to act against us, and we have been informed that they actually drew up in line of battle, in front of the port of Copenhagen, when admiral Gambier's flag-ship was still in sight of the town. The losses suffered by our commerce, from this newly created species of Danish naval force, were very considerable, and they were the more sensibly felt, because, under the apprehension of the turn which might be given, during the ensuing winter, to the politics of the court of St. Petersburgh, large purchases of hemp, timber, and other naval stores, had been made; these were sent home in single ships, in the confident expectation of having no danger to fear till they cleared the Cattegat, or that they would obtain ample protection before they reached the Sound: instead of which, they were for the most part captured by small privateers, from the isle of Bornholm, and those which escaped in that quarter, fell into the hands of the Danes, off Draco Point, where no adequate force had been stationed for their protection.

The treaty of Tilsit was scarcely concluded, when Bonaparte turned his eyes towards the west of Europe, and resolved on the subjugation of Portugal and Spain. He fomented, through Beauharnois, his ambassador at the court of Madrid, discord in the royal family of Spain, that he might assume to himself the arbitration of their differences. The ambassador suggested to the prince of Asturias, the idea of intermarrying with a princess related to the emperor Napoleon. The anxiety of the prince to avoid another connection, into which an attempt was made to force him, with a lady selected for him by his greatest enemy, the favourite at once of the queen and the king, and on that account alone the object of his aversion, induced him to acquiesce in the proposition of Beauharnois; with the reservation that it was to meet with the approbation of his royal parents; and he wrote a letter, signifying his wishes, to the French emperor. The clandestine communication between the prince of Asturias, and other circumstances artfully prepared, gave colour to an accusation of the innocent prince. A few days after he wrote that letter, the prince of Asturias was arrested and confined in the monastery of St. Laurence. On the 31st of October, all the members of the different councils of state being assembled, a declaration by the king was read, of a discovery that the prince of Asturias had formed a conspiracy for dethroning him. He had been surprized, it was said, in his own apartments, with the cyphers of his correspondence; which were laid before the council of Castile, with instructions to them to investigate the whole matter. The whole Spanish nation instantly suspected that the pretended conspiracy was an infernal calumny fabricated by the Prince of the Peace, Don Emanuel Godoy, for the purpose of removing the only obstacle that then opposed his audacious ambition.

The imprisonment of the prince of Asturias, and the decree fulminated against his royal person, produced an effect quite contrary to the expectations of the favourite; who now being afraid, thought proper to recede, and to mediate a reconciliation between the royal parents and their son. He forged penitential letters, November 5, to both the king and queen, and made the prince of Asturias, while a prisoner, sign them. There is nothing in the confession of the prince, of a very heinous nature; and all that they can be fairly supposed to allude to, is the step he had taken, in writing to Napoleon, without the king's knowledge, on the subject of the projected marriage. But a decree that had been addressed, November 3, to archbishops, bishops, prelates, and all the clergy, both secular and irregular, for a solemn thanksgiving to God for the king's deliverance, was calculated to preserve the idea, that the prince had formed or entered into a conspiracy against his father's government, if not his life. On the same day that the prince's letters were received by the king and queen, November 5, a royal edict was addressed to the governor ad interim of the council of Castile, declaring that the voice of nature having disarmed the hand of vengeance, the king had been moved by pity, and the intercession of the queen, to pardon his penitent son, who had given information against the authors of the horrible design in contemplation.

Such was the state of affairs, when a French courier arrived at the royal palace of St. Laurence, with a treaty concluded and signed at Fontainbleau, on the 27th of October, by Don Eugenio Isquierdo, as plenipotentiary of his catholic majesty, and marshal Duroc, in the name of the emperor of the French. By this treaty, it was agreed, among other articles, that the province of Entre Minho y Douro, with the city of Oporto, should be made over in entire property and sovereignty to the king of Etruria, with the title of king of Northern Lusitania. The province of Alentejo, and the kingdom of the Algarves, in entire property and sovereignty, to the prince of Peace, to be by him enjoyed under the title of prince of the Algarves. The provinces of Beira, Tras os Montes, and Portuguese Estremadura, were to remain undisposed of, until there should be a general peace. The kingdom of Northern Lusitania, and the principality of the Algarves, were to acknowledge, as their protector, his catholic majesty, the king of Spain, and in no case to make peace or war without his consent. In case of the provinces of Beira, Tras os Montes, and Portuguese Estremadura, held in sequestration, devolving at a general peace to the house of Braganza, in exchange for Gibraltar, Trinidad, and other colonies, which the English had conquered from Spain and her allies: the new sovereign of these provinces was to have, with respect to his catholic majesty, the same obligations as the king of Northern Lusitania, and to hold them on the same conditions. His majesty the king of Etruria ceded the kingdom of Etruria, in full property and sovereignty, to his majesty the emperor of the French, and king of Italy. By a secret convention, it was agreed that French troops should be admitted into Spain, where they were to be joined by bodies of Spanish troops, and march into Portugal. The troops to be subsisted and maintained by Spain, during their march through that country, but to be paid by France. The main body of the army to be under the orders of the commander of the French troops: nevertheless, it was added, should the king of Spain, or the prince of the Peace, think fit to join the said body, the French troops, with the general commanding them, were were to be subject to their order. It is probable that Bonaparte was under no hesitation in paying them this compliment. Another body of French troops, to the number of forty thousand, was to be assembled at Bayonne by the 20th of November, at the latest, to be ready to enter Spain, for the purpose of proceeding to Portugal, in case the English should send reinforcements there, or menace it with aggression.

Bonaparte demanded of the court of Lisbon, 1. To shut up the ports of Portugal against England. 2. To detain all Englishmen residing in Portugal. 3. To confiscate all English property; denouncing war in case of a refusal. And, without waiting for an answer, he gave orders for detaining all Portuguese merchant-ships that were in the ports of France. The prince-regent of Portugal, hoping to ward off the storm, acceded to the shutting up of his ports; but refused to comply with the other two demands, as being contrary to the principles of the public law, and to the treaties that subsisted between the two nations. The court of Portugal then began to adopt measures for securing its retreat to its dominions in South America. For that purpose, the prince regent ordered all ships of war fit to keep the sea, to be fitted out; and also gave warning of what was intended to the English, directing them to sell their property and leave Portugal. He resolved also to comply, if possible, with the views of the emperor of the French, in case he should not allow himself to be softened down to more moderate pretensions. But Bonaparte peremptorily insisted, not only on the shutting up of the ports, but on the imprisonment of all British subjects, the confiscation of their property, and a dereliction of the project of a retreat to America. The prince-regent, finding that all the English, not naturalized in the country, had left Portugal, and that all English property had been sold, and its amount exported, resolved to shut up the ports against England, and even to comply with the other demands of France; declaring, at the same time, that should the French troops enter Portugal, he was resolved to remove his court to Brazil.

The English ambassador, lord Strangford, had frequently stated to the cabinet of Lisbon, that the king of Great Britain, in agreeing not to resent the exclusion of British commerce from the ports of Portugal, had gone to the utmost extent of forbearance; that, in making this concession to the peculiar circumstances of the prince-regent's situation, his majesty had done all that friendship could justly require; and that a single step beyond it would lead to actual war. Nevertheless, the prince regent, in hope of preserving Portugal by conciliating France, on the 8th of November, signed an order for detaining a few British subjects, and of the very inconsiderable portion of British property that yet remained at Lisbon. On the publication of this order, lord Strangford removed the arms of England from the gates of his residence, demanded his passports, presented a final remonstrance against the recent conduct of the court of Lisbon, and proceeded, November 17th, to a British squadron, commanded by sir Sydney Smith, who immediately, on the suggestion of lord Strangford, established a most rigorous blockade at the mouth of the Tagus. A few days thereafter, the intercourse between the court of Lisbon and the British ambassador was renewed. Lord Strangford, under assurances of protection and security, proceeded to Lisbon on the 27th; when he found the prince regent directing all his apprehension to a French army, which had entered Portugal, and was on its march to Lisbon, and all his hopes to an English fleet. The object of this march he was at no loss to understand; for Bonaparte had declared in his journals, "That the house of Braganza had ceased to reign." Lord Strangford promised to his royal highness, on the faith of his sovereign, that the British squadron before the Tagus should be employed to protect his retreat from Lisbon, and his voyage to the Brazils. A decree was published, November 28, in which the prince regent announced his intention of retiring to Janeiro until the conclusion of a general peace, and of appointing a regency to administer the government at Lisbon, during his absence from Europe.

On the 29th of November, the Portuguese fleet sailed from the Tagus, with the prince of Brazil and the whole of the royal family of Braganza on board, together with many of his faithful counsellors and adherents. The fleet consisted of eight sail of the line, four large frigates, several armed brigs, sloops, and corvettes, and a number of Brazil ships; amounting in all to about thirty-six sail. While they passed through the British squadron, our ships fired a salute of twenty-one guns, which was returned with an equal number; and four English ships of the line were sent by the British admiral, to accompany the royal family to Brazil.

The Portuguese fleet had not left the Tagus, when the French, with their Spanish auxiliaries, appeared on the hills above Lisbon, under the command of general Junot, who had formerly resided for several years at the court of Portugal, in the character of an ambassador from France. Though the Portuguese had long been under an apprehension of a visit from the French, they were surprized by their sudden arrival; for the entrance of the French troops into Portugal was not known at Lisbon, till their advanced guard had reached Abrantes. The retreat of the royal family from Lisbon was, of course, a matter of extreme precipitation. Junot did not meet with any more opposition on his entrance into the capital, than when he passed, on his march, the Portuguese frontier (t).

After Portugal had fallen under the dominion of France, the valuable island of Madeira was committed to the protection of British troops; and to be restored to Portugal on the conclusion of a general peace.

We have to record the death of Henry Benedict Maria Clement, cardinal York, calling himself Henry IX. king of England, who died at Rome, in August, 1807. This gentleman was the last of the race of Stuart. He was born at Rome, on the 26th of March, 1725; and was the second son of James Stuart, commonly known by the name of "The Pretender," and of Maria Clementina Sobieski. As a Pretender to the throne of Britain, he was never very forward in urging the pretension; and his general character was that of an inoffensive and respectable individual. Towards the close of the year 1745, he went to France, to put himself at the head of fifteen thousand men, assembled under the command of the duke of Richelieu, to assist his brother Charles in his attempt on this kingdom; but receiving intelligence of the issue of the battle of Culloden, he returned to Rome, and took orders; and in 1747 was made cardinal by pope Benedict XIV. and afterwards bishop of Frescati, and chancellor of the church of St. Peter. After his brother Charles's death, in 1788, he had medals struck, having on their face his head, with "Henricus Nonus Angliæ Rex;" i. e. "Henry the Ninth, King of England:" on the reverse, a city, with "Gratia Dei, sed non Voluntate Hominum," that is, "By the Grace of God, but not by the will of Men." The cardinal had two rich livings in France, and a considerable pension from the court of Spain, all of which he lost by the revolution. In order to assist pope Pius VI. in making up the sum required by Bonaparte in 1796, he disposed of all the family jewels; and, among others, of the largest and most perfect ruby known, which was valued at fifty thousand pounds, and when the pope and his court were expelled from Rome, the cardinal was reduced to great distress. At length, in 1798, he was forced to renounce his comforts and property, and retire to Venice; which he did—infirm and destitute. His majesty George the Third, being informed of his distress, ordered a pension of four thousand pounds to be paid him for life. The cardinal of York returned to Rome in 1801, and died Doyen of the sacred college, after being one of its most disinterested members upwards of sixty years. He was also bishop of Ostre and Velletri, vice-chancellor of the holy Roman church, and arch-priest of the basilique patriarchal of St. Peter of the Vatican. Thus died the last, in a direct line, of the royal house of Stuart; and, it is understood, that an act with respect to attainder of blood was to expire at the death of this last of the Stuart family.

During the summer and autumn of 1807, wonderful events took place on the continent of Europe, and formed a great portion of the various subjects that were brought into discussion in the imperial parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, which assembled on the 21st of January, 1808. We regret, however, that our limits will not allow us to enter into a full detail of the parliamentary observations on these subjects, but we shall endeavour to give as clear and succinct a narrative of the particulars, as may be sufficient to give the reader a general idea of the whole.

The parliament assembled on the 21st of January, pur-

(t) The greatest professions were made on the part of the French army, and nation, of friendship and affection for the people of Portugal. Nevertheless, the inhabitants of Lisbon were disarmed; they were inhibited from assembling together to the number of more than ten at a time; cannon were placed in all the streets and squares; heavy contributions were imposed for the support and maintenance of the French, with their Spanish auxiliaries; and, in a word, the French system of governing subdued countries was completely established.

suant

suant to his majesty's proclamation, when the commissioners appointed to open the session, read the speech from the throne, which, as usual, turned on the leading public questions that would come under discussion in parliament: the most important of which were, the expedition to Copenhagen; our relations with Russia, Austria, and Sweden; the departure of the royal family of Portugal for the Brazils; and the orders in council respecting neutral commerce. On the motion for the address, ministers, when the speech was animadverted upon, seemed unwilling to enter into a negociation for peace. Lord viscount Milton considered the attack on Copenhagen as totally unjustifiable; that city being left defenceless, while the Danish troops were pouring towards Holstein, to watch the motions of the French, not suspecting any hostile intention on the part of England.

The next day, January 22, lord Hamilton brought up the report of the address to his majesty; when Mr. Macdonald said, that the armament of the Danes could not be considered as hostile, because the preparations in their harbours could not have been begun in the interval between the conclusion of the treaty of Tilsit and the sailing of the expedition from England; and as to the disposition of the Danes, their arming exhibited rather a jealousy of the French than of those of the English. Mr. Herbert too, was of opinion, that the present ministers had, by their expedition, disgraced the country, without either necessity or ability. Mr. Eden observed, that the treaty of Tilsit was signed on the 7th of July, 1807; that intelligence, and a copy of it reached this country on the 8th of August only; and yet orders had been given to admiral Gambier, to sail from the Downs on the 26th of July: and Mr. Pym said, it was impossible for him to approve of the expedition to Denmark.

Although the expedition to Copenhagen had been pretty fully examined in the debates occasioned by the speech from the throne, in respect of both moral law and sound policy, in which it was strongly reprobated, it was again and again brought into discussion, and continued to be, on different occasions, a subject of very animated controversy for almost the whole of the present session; but so greatly were ministers against the country's being made acquainted with the circumstances which attended the origin and progress of the expedition against Denmark, that, on a motion for the production of the papers relative to that business, they took care to secure a majority, and procure its being negatived.

The next subject which was canvassed in parliament, was the offer of mediation on the part of Russia and Austria to procure a peace between Great Britain and France; but a motion for entering into an immediate negociation for peace being made was negatived.

The expedition to the Dardanelles was then brought into discussion in the house of commons; but on the motion being made for sundry papers relative to that affair, the motion was negatived. The measure was, however, highly reprobated.

The commercial warfare, or the war of privation, in which Great Britain and France were now engaged, together with the orders of council, produced a most animated, keen, and pertinacious debate; in which it was strongly contested that the orders in council were a direct violation of the provisions of Magna Charta.

Having gone through the business of the session, in which the debates, though very long, became dry and tiresome, the royal assent was given, by commission, to a number of bills, on the 4th of July; after which the lord chancellor, having delivered a speech in his majesty's name, to both houses, prorogued the parliament to the 20th of August. The concluding, and, indeed the greater part of the speech turned on the Spanish nation, which was struggling against the usurpation of France, and therefore no longer to be considered as the enemy, but the ally of Great Britain.

The mysterious conduct of Bonaparte with respect to Spain, threw the king, the queen, the prince of Asturias, and the favourite Don Emanuel Godoy, into extreme disorder. And while they were under this distraction, the French troops spread themselves over a great portion of the Spanish nation. So far did this infatuation prevail in the administration, that orders wese issued for receiving and treating the French on a more liberal scale than their own troops.

Many important posts in Spain, as well as the whole of Portugal, being now in possession of the French, Bonaparte transmitted to the king a complaint, that no steps had been taken in the affair of the marriage of the heir apparent with his relation. To this Charles, king of Spain, replied, that retaining the same sentiments, he was desirous that the marriage might take place immediately. But Bonaparte had a view of a different nature in his mind. He sent Don Eugenio Izquierdo to Spain, who was, on his arrival at Aranjuez, immediately conducted to the presence of the royal parents, by Don Emanuel Godoy, where his conferences were carried on with the greatest secrecy, so that it was impossible for any one to discover the object of his mission. But soon after his departure from the Spanish capital, their majesties began to show a disposition to abandon both the metropolis and the peninsula, and migrate to Mexico.

The recent example of the determination of the royal family of Portugal induced Bonaparte to hope that that of Spain would take a similar resolution; but on this circumstance being known, discontent and fear pervaded all ranks and classes of persons. A popular commotion burst forth at Aranjuez, on the 17th and 19th of March, like a sudden explosion; the people being actuated by a sort of instinct of self-preservation. The favourite, who, without the title of king, had exercised all the functions of royalty, was thrown into prison. The king and queen now took the resolution of abdicating their throne; which they did in favour of their son and heir the prince of Asturias.

The grand duke of Berg now advanced with his whole army to take possession of the capital; intending to profit by the occasion, and take such steps as should best seem calculated to realize the plan of making himself master of Spain.

The prince of Asturias, (now Ferdinand VII.) was totally ignorant of the designs of Bonaparte, from the mysterious obscurity which hung about his projects; and endeavoured to conciliate the good will of the French emperor. He was not satisfied with having communicated his accession to the throne in the most friendly terms, but he appointed a deputation of three grandees of Spain to proceed to Bayonne, and in his name to compliment his imperial majesty. He also appointed another grandee of Spain to pay a similar compliment to Murat, the grand duke of Berg, who had already arrived in the vicinity of Madrid.

It was now industriously circulated that Bonaparte was on his way to Madrid to visit the royal family, and Ferdinand was, after considerable efforts persuaded to set out on the road to meet the French emperor. At Vittoria, Ferdinand received intelligence that Napoleon had arrived at Bourdeaux, and was on his way to Bayonne, where he arrived with his empress on the 15th of April. Several persons endeavoured to persuade Ferdinand not to proceed to Bayonne, but at the solicitation of general Savary, who arrived with a letter from Napoleon, dated April 16, he determined to proceed.

When Ferdinant set foot on the French territory, he remarked, that no one came to receive him till his arrival at St. Jean de Luz, when the mayor, attended by the municipality, made his appearance, and addressed his majesty in an animated manner; and was proud of having the honour of being the first to receive a king, who was the friend and ally of France. Proceeding onward, he was met by a detachment of Napoleon's guard of honour, and invited to enter Bayonne, where a place had been prepared for his residence; which he did on the 20th of April. Shortly after this, his imperial majesty arrived, accompanied by a number of his generals. The king went down to the street door to receive him, and both monarchs embraced each other with every token of friendship and affection. The emperor of the French staid but a short time with his majesty, and they embraced each other again at parting. Soon after, marshal Duroc came to invite the king to dine with the emperor, whose carriages were coming to convey the king to the castle of Marrac, about the distance of a mile and an half from Bayonne, where his imperial majesty resided, which accordingly took place. Napoleon came as far as the steps of the coach to receive his majesty; and having embraced him again, led him by the hand to the apartment provided for him.

Agreeably to the tenour of the secret engagements with Bonaparte, while the flower of the Spanish army had been transferred to the north of Germany, with a view, no doubt, to the project now going forward, bodies of French troops were speedily accumulated at different points of the northern frontier of Spain.

The French forces assembled on the borders of Spain, remained remained but a short time inactive. Early in the year, a corps entered Catalonia, and on the 16th of February, obtained possession of the town and citadel of Barcelona, with the formidable position of Monjuich. It had been industriously spread through Spain, that the French troops were destined to assist in defending the coast against any insult from the British army or navy. Advantage had been taken of the national feelings to lull the Spaniards into security, by asserting, that one great object of their powerful allies would be the reduction of Gibraltar, and its restoration to its ancient and natural masters. Whispers and surmizes too were industriously circulated of an intended invasion of Algiers and Morocco. The mask was, however, soon thrown aside, and the French army, which had advanced to Barcelona, pretending only to halt for a few days for refreshment, seized without bloodshed the citadel, Monjuich (u), and every other important post.

The fortress of St. Sebastian and Figueras were seized by the French in a similar way. At Pampeluna, however, they experienced a different reception; for, on the arrival of a French officer at the head of a body of troops from Bayonne, demanding admission and possession of the place, the governor refused to comply, until orders should arrive from his own government. The French commander then brought forward a body of three thousand men, and compelled the Spaniards, after a severe conflict, to surrender.

The French armies that had entered Spain, instead of proceeding to the southern provinces, remained inactive on the banks of the Ebro. Messengers passing to and from Madrid indicated the existence of negociations, but their object was unknown. The Spanish troops recalled from Portugal, were rapidly advancing towards the capital. The court seemed in the greatest anxiety and uncertainty, the orders of one day being uniformly countermanded by those of the next. The administration of public affairs seemed to be arrested in its course.

On the 15th of March, a report was disseminated that the king was preparing to leave Aranjuez for Seville, with a view to migrate to his American dominions, and that the troops recalled from Portugal were destined to cover his retreat; that a numerous council had been assembled on the subject, in which it had been decided to undertake the journey; that the queen and the favourite, Godoy, had avowed their desire to depart; but that the prince of Asturias opposed the design. The troops quartered in Madrid, had at the same time received orders to march. But when the public alarm was at its height, on the 16th, the king issued a proclamation, thanking his subjects for the marks they had shewn of attachment to his person, and explained the object of the French troops, which had entered his dominions with the most friendly purposes, to assist in defending the country against the common enemy. The assembling his guards, it was stated, was solely for the purpose of protecting his person and family, and not for accompanying him on a journey, which none but evil-minded persons could suppose to have been projected. The king closed this very extraordinary publication, with directing the people to conduct themselves as they had hitherto done towards the troops of his great and good ally.

The next day, March 17th, when the Spanish guards were to leave Madrid, the inhabitants crowded round them, beseeching them not to abandon their native country, for the purpose of securing the flight of a prince who sacrificed his subjects to private considerations. "Do you think," said they, "we have no more spirit than the people of Lisbon?"

On the 18th, the people poured along the road to Aranjuez. Relays for the king's carriages had been provided on the way to Seville. The village of Aranjuez was crowded with troops; and the baggage of the court lay already packed up in the apartments of the palace. The preceding night had been busily spent in preparation. The residence of the prince of the peace was protected by his proper guards, (for to such a point of dignity he had been exalted) with a peculiar countersign, while those of the palace had another. At four o'clock in the morning of the 19th, the people rushed in crowds to the favourite's hotel, but they were driven back by his guards, who in their turn were driven back by the king's body guards that had ranged themselves on the side of the people. Godoy's doors were forced; the furniture was broken; the apartments were laid waste; the princess, his spouse, daughter of don Antonio, and niece to the king of Spain, was conveyed by the people, with respect, to the king's palace. The favourite himself had disappeared, and his brother don Diego Godoy, commandant of the king's body guards, was arrested by his own troops. Their majesties, who had not retired to rest during the night, were early in the morning visited by the French ambassador, and soon after appeared a proclamation, in which the unfortunate sovereign was made to say, that having resolved to take upon himself the command of his forces by land and sea, he had thought it proper to relieve Godoy of the duties of a generalissimo, and permit him to retire to whatever place he might choose (v).

In the midst of these disorders, the king, on the 19th of March, at Aranjuez, published a declaration, signed, as usual, by himself, stating, that on account of his constant infirmities, he had resolved to abdicate the crown in favour of his well-beloved son and heir, the prince of Asturias.

The first act of the new king, Ferdinand VII. was to publish a manifesto, declaring his own innocency and that of his ministers, and stating the nature of the papers and cyphers found in his apartment at Escurial, in the month of October last. Among his first acts also, was one confiscating all the property of every description, belonging to the prince of the peace.

At the same time, he appointed the duke of Infantado, to the important station of president of the great council of Castile, the first tribunal of the kingdom, and the command of the Spanish life guards.

On the 25th of March, Ferdinand, already proclaimed king, made his public entry into Madrid, which was by this time under the power of the French.

The grand duke of Berg had, March 23rd, entered Madrid at the head of his army. The cavalry and a division of infantry were quartered within the town, whilst other divisions were encamped on the rising grounds in the neighbourhood. A corps under general Dupont was stationed at Segovia and the Escurial. This army, which amounted to fifty-four thousand men, was received by all ranks of people with the greatest joy, and peace was completely re-established at Madrid.

To preserve the tranquillity of the city, orders were issued to the patroles, to continue their rounds. All keepers of public houses were ordered to shut them up before eight o'clock at night. Manufacturers and commercial people, were ordered to continue their people in their usual employment, to keep them constantly at work, and to send the names of all absentees from their usual offices to the police magistrates. Masters of families were earnestly enjoined to restrain their children and domestics from mixing with crowds, and joining in any tumult (w).

King Charles IV. and his queen, Louisa, arrived on the 27th of April at Burgos, and on the 28th at Vittoria.

On the 29th, their majesties remained all night at Tolosa; on the 30th they came, about noon, to Irun, where they received letters from Bonaparte, and two hours after entered the walls of Bayonne, where they were received with all public respect and honour.

The officers of king Charles's household, were appointed by Bonaparte, all of them Frenchmen. On the 1st of May, the king and queen of Spain dined at the castle of Marrac with Napoleon and his empress Josephine.

The prince of Asturias, as he was still styled by the French, or Ferdinand VII. as he was called by the Spaniards, had no sooner returned from dinner at the castle of Marrac to his residence, than general Savary went to inform him, that the emperor of the French and king of Italy had determined that the house of Bourbon should no longer reign in Spain; that it should be succeeded by his; and that his imperial majesty required Ferdinand, in his own name, and that of all his family, to renounce the crown of Spain and the Indies in favour of the dynasty of (u) The garrison of Monjuich, reported to have amounted to about six thousand men, retired, and made way for the French without a struggle: indeed the whole conduct of the Spanish commanders at Barcelona remains involved in mystery and suspicion.

(v) When this was known in Madrid, the people attacked the house of Godoy, and of certain ministers of state attached to his party, and destroyed the furniture without opposition, on the part of either the magistrates, or the two Swiss regiments in the Spanish service, then quartered in the town. The prince of the peace was at last discovered in a garret, where he had been concealed for six and thirty hours, and committed to close custody in the common jail.

(w) To gratify Bonaparte, the sword that Francis I. king of France, surrendered in the famous battle of Pavia, in the reign of the emperor Charles V. of Spain, which had been kept in the royal armoury since 1525, was by order of Ferdinand, on the 5th of April, remitted to his imperial and royal majesty Napoleon, at Bayonne.

Bonaparte. But he declared, that he neither could nor would renounce his right to the crown of Spain, in favour of any individual, or family whatever, to the prejudice either of himself or the other branches of his house.

The conference on this subject between the French and Spanish ministers was interrupted by a command from Bonaparte, who had secretly heard their discourse, to attend him in his cabinet. There, Cevallos tells us, he was treated by the French emperor, as a traitor to his former master Charles; because he was now in the service of Ferdinand, and reproached in the most insulting manner, for having maintained, in a former official conference with general Monthion, that however necessary the recognition of Ferdinand's title to the throne of Spain might be to the preservation of amity between the two countries, still that his title was not to be invalidated by the withholding of any such recognition. Finding, however, Cevallos inflexible in the principles he professed, and despairing of success in a negociation with that minister, Bonaparte required Ferdinand to entrust his concerns with some other minister. Ferdinand now thought that he was actually under arrest. However, in order to establish the certainty of this fact, Cevallos, by his majesty's order, sent a note to the French minister for foreign affairs, telling him, that the king was determined to return to Madrid, to tranquillize his subjects, and to provide for the transaction of the important business of the kingdom; assuring M. Champagny, at the same time, that he himself would continue, in order to treat with his imperial majesty, on affairs reciprocally advantageous.

Bonaparte finding Ferdinand inflexible, had recourse to other expedients for effecting his object. With a view to this, the old king and queen were invited to repair to Bayonne, to arrange affairs finally.

Scarcely had Charles reached Bayonne, when he demanded that his son should resign the crown so lately assumed, signifying his resolution not to remount the throne himself, but to renounce all his rights, and those of his family, in favour of France. Ferdinand VII. overawed, a prisoner, and controlled by circumstances, on the 1st of May, transmitted in writing a conditional renunciation of the crown in favour of his father.

On the 5th of May, his imperial majesty went to visit the old king and queen of Spain. At this interview there were present, besides their majesties, the Infant Don Carlos, Godoy, the grandees of Spain, who had accompanied the new king in his journey to Bayonne, and the Spanish minister Don Pedro Cevallos. After a conference, which was continued above an hour, Ferdinand was called in by his father, "To hear," says Cevallos, "in the presence of the emperor, expressions so disgusting and humiliating that I dare not record them (x)." There seemed to be no end to the queen's reproaches and rage, when Napoleon interrupted her, by saying, "No! I give to Ferdinand the crown of Naples, and to Charles that of Etruria, with one of my nieces in marriage to each of them. Let them declare if they be willing to accept this offer." After a short silence, Don Carlos replied, "Emperor, I was not born to be a king, but an infant of Spain." Ferdinand was silent. Bonaparte, after a short pause, said, "Prince, il faut opter entre la cession et la mort."—"Cession or death;" and six hours were allowed him for coming to a determination. King Charles seconding the threat of Bonaparte, ordered his son to make an absolute resignation of the crown, under pain of being treated with all his household as an usurper of the throne, and a conspirator against the life of his father. To this proposition, Ferdinand being desirous not to involve in his misfortunes the number of persons comprehended in the threat of Charles IV. assented. And next day, in a letter to his father, after stating the circumstances of constraint in which he was placed, he made the resignation which was commanded. After this, Ferdinand was deprived of his coach of state, and sword of honour. He had no other attendant than the commandant of the party that watched him.

On the same day, a treaty of abdication was agreed to, and signed by the prince of peace, on the part of king Charles IV. and marshal Duroc on that of Bonaparte. In the first articles, Charles cedes to his majesty, the emperor Napoleon, all his rights to the throne of Spain, and the Indies, as things had come to such a pass, that he alone could re-establish social order.

In the mean time, there was, as might be expected, an action and re-action between what was going on at Bayonne, and what came to pass at Madrid. The people were now in such a state as threatened some terrible explosion, and it was not without difficulty that the junta of government, were able to calm the alarms of the people, so far as to restrain them from insulting the French, and treating them with violence.

A courier extraordinary arrived every evening at Madrid, with news of the proceedings at Bayonne. This news was not published in the gazette, but circulated under the form of letters from particular persons in the suit of the king; these bulletins were at first satisfactory; but after a short time, it was surmised that affairs at the castle of Marrac, wore but a gloomy aspect. The courier expected on Sunday, the 30th of April, did not arrive; and the mail looked for hourly, was still due on the evening of the 1st of May, when several thousands of the inhabitants of the capital assembled at the Port of the Sun, and other streets near the post-office, on the look-out for the arrival of the post. The French garrison of Madrid rested all night on their arms, and on Monday the 2d of May, the sun, says an Englishman, who was present, rose on many an unfortunate inhabitant, who was never to behold the dawn of another day.

This was the day fixed for the departure of the queen of Etruria, daughter of king Charles, and her son, Don Francisco, for Bayonne, to join the rest of the royal family. The infant Don Francisco, manifested unequivocal tears of reluctance to leave the palace. He was observed even to weep bitterly, which greatly affected the people, and raised their indignation to the highest pitch. At this instant, an aid-de-camp came with a detachment of French soldiers, and immediately there commenced a scene of carnage and horror. The populace were the first aggressors; and the French let fly vollies of musquetry, by which many innocent spectators were killed, and others wounded. The news spread over the whole city with the rapidity of lightning, and in less than an hour, every individual of the lower classes, who possessed the means, appeared in the streets in arms. At first the Spaniards had the best of it in the greater part of the city, although the Spanish troops had no share in the engagement, having been confined by their officers to their barracks. A great number of the French were killed, and their arms supplied such of the Spaniards as had none of their own. But as soon as the dispositions directed by Murat began to be carried into effect, the advantage was decidedly on the side of the French. All the French troops in Madrid were set in motion. Each column had one or more pieces of flying artillery, with which they scoured the streets as they moved onward, and which were afterwards placed at the spots from whence they would do the greatest execution (y).

Peace being restored, the inhabitants of Madrid flattered

(x) The scene to which Cevallos alludes was this. The queen, in a transport of passion, addressing Ferdinand, said, "Traitor, you have for years meditated the death of the king your father; but thanks to the vigilance, the zeal, and the loyalty, of the prince of the peace, you have not been able to effect your purpose: neither you, nor any of the infamous traitors who have co-operated with you, for the accomplishment of your designs. I tell you to your face, that you are my son, but not the son of the king. And yet, without having any other right to the crown than those of your mother, you have sought to tear it from us by force. But I agree and demand, that the emperor Napoleon shall be umpire between us: Napoleon, to whom we cede and transfer our rights, to the exclusion of our own family. I call on him to punish you and your associates, as so many traitors, and to abandon to him the whole Spanish nation." This scene of the queen bastardizing her own legitimate son in the presence of the king, his legitimate father; and proclaiming her own infamy before her husband, is something so new, surprizing, and singular, that it would not have gained universal and undoubted credit as it has done, if it were not attested by so many witnesses.

(y) The place where the Spaniards made the stoutest defence was the store-house of artillery of Monteleone House, which, besides ammunition, contained arms for ten thousand men. Thither Murat sent a detachment to take possession of the artillery and ammunition, but he found it occupied by a small number of the inhabitants of Madrid and Spanish artillery-men, under the command of two artillery officers, of the names of Doaize and Velayde. A twenty-four pounder charged with grape-shot, placed at the gate of the store-house, in front of a long and narrow street, made such havoc among the French column as it advanced by this street, that the commander was obliged to send to Murat for a reinforcement. Two other columns were dispatched with all speed to his succour. The French columns attacked this small garrison on both flanks from the windows and tops of the adjoining houses, and repeatedly summoned it to surrender, but the resolute commanders refused to listen to any propositions, and their constancy remained unshaken till they were both killed. The command of this little arsenal now devolved on a corporal of artillery, who, sensible that nothing good was to be expected from further resistance, offered to capitulate. This offer the French general readily accepted. But a Spanish officer, the major of the warlike store-house, appeared on horseback, waving a white handkerchief, ed themselves that the carnage was at an end; but in the afternoon, Murat issued general orders to his army for the immediate formation of a military tribunal, of which general Grouchy was appointed president. Before this tribunal all persons were brought who had been made prisoners in the early part of the day, or found in the street with any kind of arms about them, or any implements whatever that might possibly have been used, or by any construction considered as a weapon; those who were found with muskets, swords, penknives, and even scissars, were all of them considered as equally guilty, and ordered to be instantly shot; and the sentence was executed without a moment's delay. Several other persons were condemned to be shot on the day after the next.

The whole of the French troops employed against Madrid, on the horrible 2d of May, was computed not to have exceeded ten thousand at most; and the whole city of Madrid, by order of the junta, was disarmed.

The grand duke of Berg, May 6, issued a proclamation to his army, in which he says, that the "2d of May had forced them to draw the sword; that they had acquitted themselves to his satisfaction, and that he would not fail to report their praise-worthy conduct to the emperor; but order and tranquillity was restored; the guilty had been punished; the men who had been misled, acknowledged their errors; in short, a veil was to cover all that had passed, and that confidence ought now to return. He exhorted his soldiers to return to their old relations of friendship with the inhabitants of the capital. The conduct of the Spanish troops was worthy of eulogy. He bade the inhabitants of Madrid to banish from their minds all uneasiness and apprehension, and to see nothing in the soldiers of the grand Napoleon, the protector of Spain, but friendly troops, and faithful allies. The inhabitants of all orders and degrees, might wear their cloaks according to their usual fashion. They would not on that account, be any longer arrested, or otherwise molested.

The public mind, it was presumed, was now sufficiently prepared for the reception of an imperial decree, which was communicated to the council of Castile, May 29th, informing the council of the measures which the emperor, by virtue of his rights to the crown of Spain, which had been ceded to him, had taken for fixing the basis of the new government of the kingdom, of which the grand duke of Berg was to continue in the mean time to be viceroy; and the council of Castile were required to affix the said imperial decree on the usual places, that no man might pretend ignorance of the same.

The junta at Bayonne held their twelfth meeting on the 7th of July, the day appointed for the acceptance of the new constitution. In the chamber where they sat, were erected a magnificent throne, and a richly decorated altar, the service of which was performed by the archbishop of Burgos. Joseph Bonaparte, to whom Napoleon had transferred the crown of Spain, being seated on the throne, delivered a speech to the "Gentlemen deputies," in which, after adverting to circumstances which produced "events to which all nations in their turn, and at particular junctures, are subject;" he proceeded to touch on the intrigues of the enemies of the continent, who hoped to sever Spain from her colonies; but "if the Spaniards were disposed to make the same sacrifices with him, then should Spain be speedily tranquil and happy at home, and just and powerful abroad."—The act of constitution was read over in a loud voice, and the members of the junta, on the question being put, unanimously declared their acceptance thereof.

A short address was delivered by the president of the junta, in answer to the speech of king Joseph; after which the several members took the following oath—"I swear obedience to the king, the constitution, and the laws." The junta then attended his majesty's levee, to pay him their respects on the occasion. The viceroy of Spain, Murat, was present at the inauguration of king Joseph.

King Joseph set foot on the territory of Spain on the 9th of July, escorted by a guard of four thousand Italian troops, and followed by upwards of an hundred coaches, carrying his suite, and the members of the Bayonne junta. This guard, gradually increased, amounted, by the time Joseph arrived at Madrid, to ten thousand; but his true guard was an army of eighteen thousand men, under marshal Bessieres, properly posted for that purpose. Napoleon accompanied him as far as Trun, twelve miles distant from the frontier. On the 20th of July, king Joseph made his public entry into Madrid.—On the same day Bonaparte, with Josephine, set out from Bayonne, and arrived at St. Cloud, on the 16th of August.

When Bonaparte's arrangements relative to the settlement of Spain seemed to be completed, and waited only for the sanction of the junta he had called to Bayonne, insurrections broke out in all the provinces not immediately under the controul of that monarch's arms. These insurrections did not appear to cause him any uneasiness, and even after they began to wear a serious aspect he regarded the Spanish commotions with indifference and contempt. The public mind in Spain was in a state of fermentation ever since the affair at Madrid on the 2nd of May; but when the Madrid Gazette of the 20th of that month proclaimed the abdication of the Spanish crown by Ferdinand VII. in favour of Napoleon, there was a great and general insurrection. The anniversary of St. Ferdinand, the tutelar saint of the prince, was on the 27th of the same month, which seemed to awaken the Spaniards from their supineness; for on that day the insurrection broke out in different parts of that country (z).

The reign of mere democracy was however of very short duration. The zeal and efforts of unconnected individuals, were quickly brought into unity of design and action, by the establishment of provincial juntas. The municipal kerchief, and proclaiming peace; on which the French were suffered to take possession of the place. In about two hours the firing in every part of the town ceased; an effect produced by the personal interposition of the members of the council of Castile and the other tribunals, who flew from one street to another on horseback, accompanied by several Spanish noblemen, with some French generals, and escorted by parties of cavalry, consisting of Spanish body guards and troopers belonging to the French imperial guards, mixed together.

(z) Don Miguel de Saavedra, captain-general of the province of Valentia, where the insurrection first broke out, who attempted to oppose the views of the insurgents, was put to death. The insurgents then demanded, that all the goods belonging to the French should be declared to be forfeited, and their persons secured in the citadel. A few days after this they dragged the crew of a French ship, which had been pursued by an English frigate, and sought refuge on the Spanish coast, to prison; and on the 14th of June, in a fresh paroxysm of rage, they massacred them. At Cuença, the corregidor and the intendant were thrown into chains, and carried off by a party of peasants. The governor of Carthagena was murdered. General Truxillo, governor of Malaga, was murdered at Granada. His body was dragged through the streets, cut in pieces, and afterwards burnt. The French consul at Malaga, Mornard, and some French merchants of that place, were secured on the 4th of June from the fury of the people, in the Moorish castle of Gibralforo. A great quantity of arms and ammunition taken from an English privateer in 1800, had been lodged in a warehouse in the suburbs, to be sold. On the 20th of June a report prevailed, that this magazine had been purchased by the French consul for the use of the French army. The people of Malaga marched to the castle, and, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the deputy-governor, and the resistance of the guard, they burst into the castle, pierced the victim of their fury with a thousand daggers, and burned his dead body in a bonfire made of the furniture and some wrecks of the consul's house. The depot was broken open, and all that it contained destroyed. All this was done in spite of every effort on the part of the municipal government of Malaga to prevent it. This tumult was at last quelled by a singular expedient. The dean and chapter fell on the expedient of a procession, to thank God for their deliverance from the oppressor. The multitude immediately joined the procession, and tranquillity was restored. The governor of St. Lucas Barameda was massacred. At Jaen, the peasants murdered the corregidor, and plundered the town.

Similar scenes were exhibited in Estremadura and the Castiles. At Badajoz the insurrection broke out on the 30th of May, and was in an instant matured. The palace of the governor was assaulted. The insurgents demanded arms, to be enrolled, and formed into a regular body. The government, with the bishop, appeared at the balcony, exhorting the multitude to retire, but in vain. They overpowered the guard of the palace, rushed in, seized the governor, and dragged him as far as the Palm gate, where with knives and sticks they destroyed him.

At Cadiz, on the 29th of May, the people rose against the lieutenant general Solano, marquis del Socorro, captain general of the province of Andalusia, and governor of the city of Cadiz. The marquis, with the Spanish troops under his command, had been recalled for the purpose of covering the flight of Charles IV. from Aranjuez to Seville. At Madrid he formed an intimate and confidential connection with Murat, the grand duke of Berg, and general O'Farrel, an Irishman in the Spanish service, but drawn over to the side of the French. Solano appeared at the balcony, and endeavoured to persuade the people, that the power of the emperor of the French was altogether irresistible, and that if they should attempt to resist his will by force, they would precipitate their own destruction. They heard him with patience a long time; but interrupted him at last, by repeating their cry of "arms and ammunition. Long live Ferdinand VII." Arms were brought from the barracks, and a cannon from the bulwarks. The gates of the palace were instantly forced: the governor's guard was disarmed: Solano himself, attempting to make his escape by the tops of the houses, was seized and dragged into the street. Even in this extremity, he proclaimed the power and the vengeance of Bonaparte, and declared, "that he was ready to die in the cause of the grand Napoleon." A person who was near him, on hearing these words, dashed his brains out at one blow with a club.

Some excesses were committed in the provinces of Leon and Asturias. At Corunna, in Gallicia, on the 1st of June, the people demanded that all the French residing at Corunna should be arrested.

nicipal government of the towns of Spain, though complicated, wore in general an air of popular representation. Wherever there were two thousand householders, four deputies, and a syndic were named by the people, and formed part of the town council. All classes of men were obedient to the authority of the juntas, who were animated by one spirit of national indignation. Noblemen and gentlemen, the clergy of all conditions, manufacturers, artizans, and labourers, all presented themselves voluntarily to be enrolled in the public service. There were not less than twenty-four universities in Spain, and several of them crowded with students, who took upon them the profession of arms. Of the companies of students, some were called the company of Brutus, others the company of Cato, the company of the People, and by other allusions to the great cause of freedom. On their standards was inscribed Liberty or Death!

After the tragical end of Solano, the lieutenant-generalship of Andalusia and government of Cadiz were conferred by the supreme junta of Seville on don Thomas Morla, who had been long odious to the nobility on account of his attachment to the prince of peace; but, as his great rival and adversary, general O'Farrel, had gone over to the French, his subsequent declarations of irreconcilable hatred to that party were believed to be sincere.

In the mean time, in consequence of the concert between general Castanos and the patriots of Cadiz on the one part, and the commanders of the British forces at Gibraltar in the Mediterranean on the other, lord Collingwood arrived with ships to take the command of the English fleet off Cadiz, and general Spencer with five or six English regiments from Gibraltar, and the two Swiss regiments of Meuron and Watteville. Lord Collingwood offered his services for the reduction of the French fleet: but Morla very properly determined, that this should be exclusively, an achievement of the Spaniards. The French ships lay in the canal of the arsenal in such a position, that they were out of the reach of the cannon of the castles, as well as of the Spanish squadron off Cadiz. But gun-boats, bomb-vessels, and tremendous batteries, constructed on the isle of Leon and near fort Louis, soon reduced admiral Rosilly to surrender (June 14,) the French fleet, after offering in vain, terms of capitulation. The French fleet consisted of five ships of the line, of seventy-four guns, one frigate, and four thousand seamen and marines.

Advice having been received, that a small detachment of French had assembled at Tavira, to enter Spain by the river Guadiana, general Spencer, with the small detachment under his command, at the entreaty of general Morla, set sail for the Guadiana, and landed his troops at Ayamonte. Three ships had already been sent to the mouth of the Guadiana by admiral Purvis. In consequence of these movements, the French retired in all directions on Lisbon, with the exception of some weak detachments, left to occupy the small forts of other positions on that side of Portugal. The Portuguese, animated by the presence of the English, and the example of the Spaniards, rose against the French. Deputations were sent from every part of Portugal to admiral sir Charles Cotton, commanding the naval forces of Britain in that quarter, soliciting succours. The admiral, with due frankness, immediately replied: "Agreeably to your desires, I send you ships, troops, arms, and ammunition: and have given orders for hoisting the flag of his royal highness the prince regent of Portugal, around which the whole Portuguese nation ought instantly to rally, and take up arms in a cause at once so just and so glorious."

It is scarcely necessary to mention that the efforts of the Spaniards were immediately followed by peace between that nation and Great Britain and her allies. Proclamations of peace and amity with England and her ally Sweden, were published by the juntas; and, as for England, whatever power was at war with France, was at peace with England. Preliminaries of a new and perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive, between the two nations of Spain and Portugal, were signed at Oporto, in the name of Ferdinand VII. and the prince regent of Portugal, July 14, 1808. The bishop of Oporto, president of the junta of government of that city, which, Lisbon as well as Madrid being in the hands of the French, seems to have taken a pattern from Seville, signed the treaty in the name of the prince.

On the 9th of June, six Spanish gentlemen, having at their head the viscount de Materosa and don Diego de la Vega, arrived in London, and they were followed by a succession of deputies from other provinces, both Spanish and Portuguese. Peace was proclaimed with Spain in the London Gazette of the 5th of July. The Spanish prisoners in our jails, to the number of several thousands, were set free, cloathed, and sent home to join their brethren in arms. The British arsenals, fleets and squadrons, and treasures: all that Spain could demand, or England afford, was without hesitation or delay liberally granted (a).

On the 20th of July, about three o'clock in the morning, the army under Dupont attacked the Spaniards; whose army was twenty-five thousand: of these twenty-five thousand the half were peasants. The force of Dupont did not exceed eight thousand. The first shock of the French was so furious, that the foremost companies of the Spaniards, suffered prodigiously. But the Spaniards maintained their ground, and supported by their artillery, attacked and drove the French back before them at all points. Yet the French nobly kept up the conflict, constantly renewing their assaults without any other interruption than what was unavoidably occasioned by momentary retreats, for the formation of fresh columns, till half an hour past mid-day. At two o'clock P. M. the advanced guard of the division under general Pena arrived at the scene of action, and began to play on the enemy with his artillery; when a flag of truce appeared, desiring to treat for a capitulation. An armistice ensued of course. But during this, the Spanish division under the command of general Pena, was attacked by the French division, six thousand strong, under general Wedel, who came up, while Dupont was engaged with the generals Reding and Coupigny. The battalion of Cordova was surprized and taken, with two field pieces. The number of the French killed and wounded in the battle of Baylen, amounted, it was computed, to three thousand; that of the Spaniards was much more considerable. The negociation between Dupont and the Spanish commander-in-chief, general Castanos, did not last long. Dupont was told that he must surrender at discretion: which he agreed to. General Wedel's division was comprehended in the capitulation, as well as that of Dupont, forming together a body of fourteen thousand. It was agreed that general Wedel's division should be sent home by sea, to Rochfort.

Marshal Moncey was not more successful in Valentia than general Dupont in Andalusia, though he escaped capture, and made good his retreat, but with a heavy loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, to Madrid. The passes through the rugged mountains were guarded by some troops of the line, and a considerable body of Valentian insurgents. These guards were attacked by Moncey, on the 21st of June, and routed. Having crossed the mountains, he marched to Valentia.

On the 26th, he was attacked at Bunolos by general Caro, a nephew of general Romana, and suffered severely, in both cavalry and infantry. He was attacked again by general Caro, between Quarte and Mislata, when he also sustained considerable loss. Nevertheless, though thus harassed, he continued his march, and on the 28th, opened a heavy fire on Valentia, of both artillery and musquetry, which was continued without ceasing from mid-day to the evening. The Valentians returned his fire with some pieces of artillery planted at the gates of the city, and by showers of musketry from the tops of houses. On the other hand, he had to maintain a conflict with general Caro, who had followed the French close at their heels, for the defence of Valentia. An impetuous charge with the bayonet, made such havoc among the ranks of the French, that they retired, at about eight o'clock at night to their camp between Quarte and Mislata, which was fortified by strong entrenchments and formidable batteries. From thence he continued his retreat to Madrid, harassed for some days by general Caro, as he had been on his march through the plain of Valentia. Fifteen hundred were made prisoners, and sent to Carthagena.

Early in June, a detachment of eight thousand French infantry, and nine hundred cavalry, under the general of division Le Fevre, began to march from Pampeluna against (a) The first supply to the Spanish patriots, which was sent within a few days after the arrival of the Asturian deputies, consisted of three hundred thousand pounds sterling in dollars, five thousand muskets, thirty thousand pikes, and an immense quantity of powder and balls. Materosa's secretary was sent home, together with three British officers of rank, with these succours, and assurances that others should be sent from time to time, as well as troops, and whatever the patriots might need.

Saragossa. After a succession of skirmishes with the Arragonese, at Tudela, Mallen Gaul, and Alagon, the French advanced, June 14, within a short distance of Saragossa, where they took up a position in the valley on the opposite side of the town, to that side which was situated on the Ebro. Having occupied this post, they deferred their general attack on the city till the next day: but a small detachment of cavalry that penetrated into the town on the 14th of June, paid dearly for their rashness. On the 15th, the French sent a detachment against the outposts on the canal of Arragon, while their main body attempted to storm the city by the gate called Portillo. The efforts of the Arragonese were, after a most severe conflict, finally crowned with success. A party of the French that entered the town, were instantly put to death, and Le Fevre withdrew his troops out of the reach of the Arragonese cannon.

The French being thus repulsed, general Joseph Palafox set out from Saragossa to collect reinforcements, and provide resources for a siege, and to place the rest of the kingdom in a state of defence, in case of the reduction of the capital. He found from twelve to fourteen hundred soldiers who had escaped from Madrid, and he united with them a small division of militia stationed at Calatayud. With this force he determined to attack the French. He hoped now to place the French between his little army and the city of Saragossa; but was frustrated by a sudden attack on the part of the enemy in the night at Epila, when the Spaniards, after an obstinate resistance, were compelled to yield to superior discipline. The wrecks of this force retired to Calatayud, and afterwards with great difficulty threw themselves into Saragossa.

The French, however, received reinforcements of troops and artillery from Pampeluna, and began to occupy the several military positions in the plain covered with olive trees that surrounds Saragossa: but in a short time the French had invested nearly one half of the town, and on the 28th of June they took possession of Torrero. The battery on the neighbouring height also, which had been entrusted to an artillery officer, and five hundred men, fell into their hands. The officer was declared a traitor to his country, for not having defended this important post as he ought to have done, and on his return into Saragossa, was immediately hanged. After the surrender of the Torrero, the city could not communicate with the country on any other side than that of the Ebro.

During these operations of the enemy the Arragonese were busily employed in placing their town in the best possible state of defence that their slender resources would admit of. Scarcely had a day passed without a sanguinary contest between detachments of the French and Arragonese, in the neighbouring olive woods. About the last day of June, a powder magazine in the heart of the city blew up, and in a moment nearly a whole street was reduced to a heap of ruins. The inhabitants had scarcely recovered from their consternation, when the French, who had received mortars, howitzers, and cannon, opened a destructive fire upon the city. The sand-bag battery before the gate called Portillo, against which the attack of the enemy was principally directed, was gallantly defended. It was several times destroyed, and as often reconstructed under the fire of the enemy (b). Attack was made after attack; Saragossa was more and more closely invested. Above the city the Ebro was fordable, and below it the French, in spite of the efforts of the Arragonese, constructed a bridge. Having by these means transported their cavalry to the opposite bank of the river, they destroyed the mills which supplied the town with flour, levied contributions in the different villages, and cut off the only communication by which the besieged could receive any supplies either of provisions or ammunition. In this critical situation, the active and intelligent captain general of Arragon, established in various parts of the city corn mills worked by horses, and ordered the monks to be employed, under skilful directors, in manufacturing gun-powder.

Towards the end of July, the large population of Saragossa was but scantily supplied with food, and had but little or no hope of succour. By the unremitted exertions of forty-six days, their spirits were exhausted, and their bodily strength impaired. A desperate effort was made to recover the important post of Torrero, in vain; after which, the Arragonese, despairing of being able to make any sortie with effect, resolved to conquer or perish within the walls. During a bombardment on the 2d and 3d of August, a foundling hospital, which contained the sick and wounded, who from time to time had been conveyed there during the siege, unfortunately caught fire, and was rapidly consumed. On the 4th of August, the French opened a tremendous battery on the quarter of the city called Santa Engracia. In an instant the mudwalls opposite to their batteries vanished; and the splendid convent of Santa Engracia was on fire and tottering in ruins. The French columns immediately rushed through this entrance into the city, took the batteries before the adjacent gates in reverse, and after a most sanguinary conflict, penetrating to the centre of the town, were in possession before the day closed of one half of Saragossa. The French general then demanded a capitulation; but that was refused by Palafox; who declared he would carry on the war by the knife, when every other method failed. One side of the street Corso, was now occupied by the French, in the centre of which general Verdier was seen giving his orders from the Franciscan convent. The Arragonese maintained their positions on the opposite side, throwing up batteries at the openings of the streets within a few paces of similar batteries of the French. The intervening space was soon heaped up with dead, either thrown from the windows of the houses in which they had been slain, or killed in the conflicts below. From this enormous accumulation of the dead, there was the utmost reason to apprehend a pestilence. To an Arragonese it was almost certain death to appear in the middle of the street. On the 5th of August, when the French were expected to renew their efforts to obtain complete possession of the city, the Arragonese found their ammunition beginning to fail. The only cry that assailed the ears of the gallant general, as he rode amongst the people was, that if ammunition failed, they were ready to attack the enemy with their knives. At this aweful crisis, just before the fall of night, a convoy of provisions and ammunition, with a reinforcement of three thousand men, composed of Spanish guards, Swiss, and volunteers of Arragon, unexpectedly made their entrance into the city, under the command of Don Francisco Palafox, the brother of the captain general. During the night of the 13th of August, the fire of the French was particularly destructive; and when their batteries ceased, flames were seen to burst out in many parts of the buildings in their possession. On the morning of the 14th, to the great surprize of the Arragonese, their columns were seen at a distance retreating over the plain on the road to Pampeluna. The retreating French were followed into Navarre by general Palafox, with a force composed of Arragonese and Valentians, who had begun their march for the relief of Saragossa, when the siege was raised.

Duhesme, the French governor of Catalonia, had been directed to reduce Gerona, at the same time that Lefevre was sent against Saragossa. Gerona gave an earnest of that valour and patriotism, which was found afterwards to equal those of Saragossa. Duhesme, after spending upwards of a fortnight in the siege of Gerona, into which he threw in one night four hundred bombs and grenades, was forced, by the vigorous sallies of the Geronese, and the movements of other Catalonians, who threatened to attack him in flank and rear, to retreat to Barcelona, leaving before Gerona some pieces of artillery, and a considerable quantity of provisions and ammunition. In his retreat he sustained a great loss both of men and baggage.

On the 30th of June, in the morning, the French, under general Goulles, and brigadier general Bessieres, marched from Barcelona against the main strength of the insurgents, which rested on the right bank of the Llobregat. Proceeding to the mouth of the river, they forced the passage, and pushing up the right bank, took several Catalonian posts in the rear. At the same time general Leckie, with a division of French, fifteen hundred strong, assailed and took possession of the bridge of Molinos del Rey, with the three pieces that guarded the passage-way; but not without a well-fought battle, in which the loss on both sides was computed to be nearly equal. On the side of Figueras, general Reible proceeded against the insurgents, on the 5th of July. The insurgents being worsted in a smart action, and dispersed, he threw provisions into the place, and a reinforcement into the garrison.

(b) Here an act of heroism was performed by a female, to which there is scarcely any thing equal in history. Augustina Saragossa, about twenty-two years of age, a handsome young woman, of the lower class of the people, whilst performing her duty of carrying refreshments to the gates, arrived at the battery of the Portillo, at the very moment when the fire of the French had absolutely destroyed every person that was stationed on it. The citizens and soldiers, for a moment, hesitated to re-man the guns. Augustina, rushing forward over the wounded and slain, snatched a match from the hand of a dead artilleryman, and fired off a twenty-six pounder. Then, jumping upon the gun, she made a solemn vow never to quit it alive during the siege; and her fellow-citizens, stimulated by this daring act of intrepidity to fresh exertions, instantly rushed into the battery, and again opened a tremendous fire on the enemy. Mr. Vaughan, fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, and one of Dr. Ratcliffe's travelling fellows from that university, whose excellent narrative has been our principal guide in this account of the siege of Saragossa, relates, that when he saw this heroine there, "She had a small shield of honour embroidered on the sleeve of her gown, with Zaragoza inscribed upon it, and was receiving a pension from the government, and the daily pay of an artilleryman."

General Duhesme, in revenge for his repulse from Gerona, burnt many houses in the towns and villages by which he passed, took many prisoners, and laid waste the whole plain within the jurisdiction of the city of Barcelona; all the cultivated fields, villages, convents, and churches.

When general Duhesme returned to Barcelona, he found his two forts in great want of powder and provisions. During his absence about a month from Barcelona, it had been cut off from a free intercourse with the neighbouring country. And a vessel loaded with powder for their use, and another with salted pork, had been taken by the English. Duhesme pointed the cannon of the citadel against the inhabitants, threatening them with death if they did not furnish him with twelve thousand rations of provisions daily, and an excessive number of pipes of wine and brandy.

In the mean time the affairs of the patriots in the north of Spain wore an unfavourable aspect, and a battle was fought at Medina del Rio Seco, in the province of Leon, which turned the tide of fortune, and was only counterbalanced by the events in the south and the east just related.

Marshal Bessieres at the same time that he sent a force against Saragossa, pushed forward columns for the reduction of Logrono, Segovia, Valladolid, and St. Andero. All these objects were easily accomplished; for the Spaniards consulted their safety by flight, for the most part throwing down their arms. On the 7th of June, general Frere, having arrived with his column within a quarter of a mile of Segovia, sent an officer to the magistrates demanding a parley. The insurgents, five thousand strong, with thirty pieces of cannon, would not suffer the messenger to approach, but fired on him. On this the place was taken by force; the resistance here was not inconsiderable; a great number of wounded and others, fell into the hands of the French, with all their cannon. The city of Segovia, after the defeat and flight of the armed peasants, made its submissions, in the manner required by the French general. When general La Salle, June 8th, was approaching Palentia, a deputation, with the bishop at their head, brought the submission of the town. The town and province of Palentia were disarmed. On the 12th of June, general La Salle advanced to Duennas, where he formed a junction with general Merle, and from thence continued his march to Valladolid, where the spirit of insurrection had grown very strong, and which was a great rendezvous of the patriots. General Cuesta, with seven thousand men, and six pieces of artillery, had taken post at Cabezon, a small town on the Pisuerga, about nine miles to the north of Valladolid. General Sabathier was ordered to force the position, which had been reconnoitred, of the insurgents, whilst general Merle was directed to cut off his retreat to Valladolid. The firing, according to the French accounts, lasted but half an hour, when the insurgents were completely beaten, scattered in every direction on the field of battle, leaving their artillery, four thousand muskets, and about one thousand killed.

The bishop of Valladolid, with the principal clergy of the city, came to meet general La Salle, supplicating forgiveness to the city and its inhabitants, which was readily granted. The city and province of Valladolid was disarmed. Ten members of the council of Placentia, Segovia, and Valladolid, were deputed to go to his Catholic majesty (Joseph Bonaparte) at Bayonne, there to supplicate his forgiveness, in the act of tendering their own fealty, and that of their fellow citizens.

General Merle proceeded to the mountains of St. Andero: on the morning of the 21st of June, he fell upon the insurgents, headed by the bishop, drove them from their positions, and took from them two eighteen pounders, which, loaded with grape shot, they had fired only twice. In other parts of the mountainous district, parties of the insurgents were driven from post to post into St. Andero, by general Ducos. On the 23d, generals Merle and Ducos entered St. Andero, on different sides of the town; which having made its submission, was obliged to swear fealty to the French.

A great number of patriots had been assembling, for some time, at Benevento, under the standard of general Cuesta. In this number were comprehended all the Spanish prisoners who had been sent back to Spain by the British government. With this force, general Cuesta marched to Valladolid, with the design of cutting off the communication between the French in the northern provinces of Spain, and those in Madrid. It was his plan, having reduced Valladolid, to advance to Burgos. The force under Cuesta, is stated to have amounted to thirty-five thousand men. Marshal Bessieres advanced to meet them with a force, amounting in all to twelve thousand, of which two thousand were cavalry, with a proportionate train of artillery. On the 14th of July, at day break, he came in sight of the enemy, and attacked them on the right. And at the same time general Monton, at the head of another division, made himself master of the town of Medina del Rio Seco, with fixed bayonets. The Spaniards fled in great confusion; and lost all their artillery, consisting of forty pieces of cannon. Six thousand were made prisoners, and more than twelve thousand left on the field of battle. All their baggage and military stores fell into the hands of the French. They were pursued by marshal Bessieres, who at Benevento, July 19th, found an immense quantity of arms and ammunition. Here, he received a letter of submission from Zamora, and on the following day, the 20th, he entered that town, whence he proceeded to Majorga; where he received a deputation from Leon, which city he entered on the 26th. The bishop came two miles to meet him, and the council appearing before the gates of the city, presented the keys in token of submission.

The kind of order observed by the Spaniards, is sufficiently illustrated by the rapidity of their retreat, and the distance to which they retreated. On the other hand, that their disasters were not so great as had been given out, and that reinforcements were advancing to join general Cuesta, is rendered extremely probable by the retreat or flight of king Joseph Bonaparte, on the 27th of July, from Madrid, who took the route of Segovia, from whence he proceeded to Burgos. The French carried along with them all the artillery and ammunition, for which they could find means of conveyance; spiking the cannon, and destroying the ammunition they were obliged to leave behind them. The French army was accompanied or followed by such of the Spaniards as had accepted offices under the government of Joseph, and most of the French established in various situations in Madrid.

By a well combined plan, concerted between the English admiral Keats, in the Baltic, and the marquis Romana, ten thousand of the Spanish troops stationed in Funen, Langeland, Zealand, and Jutland, emancipated themselves from the French yoke, and, under the protection of the British fleet, were conveyed, with their stores, arms, and artillery, to Spain, where they landed at Corunna on the 30th of September. The marquis of Romana himself returned home by the way of London, where he arrived on the 16th of September, for the purpose of having a conference with the British ministry, and British military officers. One Spanish regiment of two thousand men, was too critically situated in Jutland to effect its escape: and two in Zealand were disarmed. While the French general Frision was in the act of haranguing these troops, for the purpose of engaging them to declare for king Joseph, one of the soldiers stepped forth from the ranks and fired a pistol at him, which missing the general, killed the aid-de-camp (c).

When the real state of Spain became manifest to Europe by the flight of king Joseph from Madrid, and the concentration

(c) The marquis de la Romana was kept in profound ignorance of the events that had taken place in his country, and various attempts had been made on the part of the British government, to communicate the tidings to him, and to devise means for his escape with the troops under his command, without effect. At length a Swedish clergyman was found in whom the firmest confidence could be placed. This gentleman, disguised as a low and travelling tradesman, went by the way of Heligoland, and having overcome many obstacles with the utmost patience, prudence, and fortitude, at length arrived at the place where the marquis and his troops were stationed. Having ascertained the person of the marquis, he was obliged to watch incessantly for an opportunity of addressing him, without exciting the suspicion of the numerous spies by whom concentration of the French forces on the defiles of Biscay, and on the Ebro, Bonaparte's military operations were interrupted; and it was evident, that the Spanish insurrection was of too serious a nature to be treated lightly.

The inhabitants of Lisbon, overawed by the army of Junot, were restrained at first from expressing their joy, otherwise than in private and confidential conversation. The public voice of Portugal was first heard at Oporto. This town, besides the circumstance of being situate at a considerable distance from the force under Junot, possessed another advantage. It had been occupied by about three thousand Spanish troops, who before their departure to join the patriotic standard in Spain, took the French general under whose orders they were, and all his staff, prisoners, and delivered up the government of the city to Lewis D'Oliveda, who had filled that office before the arrival of the French. The treachery of this man, his attachment to the French, and the measures he took for restoring their authority, roused the indignation of the people; so that he found it impossible to avert their threatened vengeance otherwise than by yielding up his authority. They rose on the 18th of June, broke open the depots of stores, and having supplied themselves with arms, proceeded to destroy every vestige of French power, and to imprison every person suspected of being in their interest. The bishop of Oporto, who, with most of the other priests, had endeavoured to rouse the people to arms, was appointed governor of the city, and vigorous measures were adopted for defending it against any force. General Loison, with about three thousand men, advanced against the insurgents as far as Amirante; but on being made acquainted with the determined spirit of the people of Oporto, he retreated on Lisbon. Nearly the whole of the northern provinces of Portugal, rose in arms against the French. The south of Portugal was restrained from coming forward in so open a manner, by their vicinity to the army of Junot, and by a strong and numerous French party among themselves. Notwithstanding the terror, however, of Junot, a friendly intercourse was maintained between Lisbon and sir Charles Cotton.

As soon as Junot received certain intelligence of the Spanish insurrection, he ordered the Spanish troops to be disarmed, and put on board the hulks in the Tagus.

The French being expelled from the northern provinces of Portugal, and the authority of the prince regent re-established, provisional juntas were formed, similar to those of Spain. That of Oporto exerted itself with the utmost zeal and effect, in heightening and directing the enthusiasm of the people, and in the establishment of such orders and regulations as were required by the peculiar circumstances of the country. They naturally looked for support and assistance to England, nor were their hopes disappointed. An army, under the command of sir Arthur Wellesley, destined for Portugal, were it ultimately landed, was, in the first instance, offered to the Spaniards. This army, consisting of about ten thousand men, set sail from Cork, on the 12th of July, and arrived at Corunna on the 20th. The battle of Medina del Rio Seco had taken place a few days before, and the Spaniards were retreating in different directions: one division of them adhering to Cuesta, proceeded to Salamanca; another, under general Blake, made for the mountains. In consequence of this intelligence, combined with his instructions, sir Arthur Wellesley offered the assistance of the force under his command to the junta of Gallicia. The junta replied, that they did not want men, and they wished for nothing from the British government except money, arms, and ammunition. Sir Arthur leaving Corunna, proceeded to Oporto. On his arrival there, the bishop, who was the governor, informed him. that the Portuguese force was sufficient to deter the French from making any attacks, or if not, to repel them. Sir Arthur, however, that he might be the better enabled to judge what was best to be done, left his forces at Oporto, in order to have a conference with sir Charles Cotton, off Lisbon; and in the mean time, he received a letter from general Spencer, who was then, with about six thousand men, off Cadiz. Sir Arthur was of opinion that his own army, and that of general Spencer, could be but of little avail towards the expulsion of the French from Portugal, while they acted separately, and therefore gave orders to that general to join him.

The English general, then determined to land his forces in Mondego bay, where he would be able to effect a landing, and to form his army into order, without opposition from the enemy; while at the same time, he would be assisted and supported by the Portuguese army which had advanced to Coimbra. Before he landed the troops he received advice from the British government that five thousand men, under general Anstruther, were proceeding to join him, and that twelve thousand more, under sir John Moore, would speedily be dispatched for the same purpose. He was also informed that the army of Junot was weakened by sending six thousand men, under general Loison, to quell an insurrection in the south of Portugal. Soon after the disembarkation, the corps under general Spencer also landed; and on the 9th of August, the advanced guard marched forward on the road to Lisbon. On the 12th the army reached Legria. On the 15th the advanced guard came up with a party of the French at Obidos, where a slight action took place. On the 16th the army halted, and on the next day the general came to the determination of attacking the French under general Laborde at Roleia; which is situated on an eminence, having a plain in its front, at the end of a valley, which commences at Caldas; about eight miles from Roleia, is the town and old Moorish fort of Obidos, whence the enemy's pickets had been driven on the 15th. The French force amounted to about six thousand, of which about five hundred were cavalry, with five pieces of cannon. And there was some reason to believe that general Loison, who was at Rio Major on the 16th, would join general Laborde by his right in the course of the night. The plan of attack was formed accordingly, and the army breaking up from Caldas on the 17th, was formed into three columns. The enemy was defeated, but retreated in good order. By this victory the road was cleared to Lisbon. On the day after the battle the British army moved to Lourinha, to protect the landing and facilitate the junction of the troops under general Anstruther; and on the 21st they resumed their march.

General Junot, having been informed of the large reinforcements expected under sir John Moore, determined to attack the British army before the reinforcements should arrive. He therefore left Lisbon with nearly the whole of the forces under his command, and came up with sir Arthur on the morning of the 21st of August. A hard fought battle ensued. The French, with fixed bayonets, attacked the British with their usual impetuosity. They were driven back by our troops with the bayonet. They renewed their attacks, in different columns, again and again, and were as often driven back. At last they fled from the charge. In this battle the French lost thirteen pieces of cannon, twenty-three ammunition waggons, and about three thousand in killed, wounded, and missing. One general officer was wounded and taken prisoner, and another was killed. Our loss in killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to upwards of a thousand.

After the dispositions for the battle of Vimeira had been made, sir H. Burrard arrived at the scene of action, but declined to take upon himself the command of the army. On the 22d, sir Hew Dalrymple reached Cintra, the place to which the British army had moved after the battle. Within a very few hours after his arrival, a flag of truce came in from Junot, proposing a cessation of hostilities, in order that a convention might be settled, by which the French should evacuate Portugal.

When intelligence was received in England, that in the words of sir Arthur Wellesley, "The whole of the French force in Portugal, under the command of the duke of Abrantes in person, had sustained a signal defeat;" there was an universal expectation, that it would be followed up with whom he was surrounded. The venerable agent at last was obliged, as if by accident, to jostle the marquis in the street, in order to attract his attention. Having done so, he apologized, as if ignorant of the person whom he addressed, and concluded with offering to sell him some excellent coffee. The marquis treated this offer with contempt, and signified that he supposed he was speaking to a smuggler. The minister of the gospel, however, persevered in recommending his coffee, and in the course of the conversation, found means to intimate that he was not a smuggler but a gentleman.—"We'll soon see that," said the marquis, and then asked him if he could speak Latin. The minister answered in the affirmative, and a conversation ensued, apparently about coffee, and the gestures of both were calculated to deceive all who might observe them. The marquis was then informed of the outlines of what had occurred in Spain, of the assistance the British government had rendered, and of the readiness of his Britannic majesty to adopt any measure that might be thought practicable for effecting the rescue of himself and his troops, that they might join their heroic countrymen in resisting the base attempts of France to enslave them.

other

other victories, and ultimately lead to some solid advantage (d).

The indignation of the British nation was raised by the convention of Cintra, to a painful height. The throne was besieged, as it were, with petitions from all parts of the kingdom, calling loudly for an inquiry into that transaction. The answer to the petition from the city of London, that for "The institution of an inquiry, there was no need of their interference," was universally deemed ungracious. An inquiry, however, was set on foot. The board in their report, after giving a well-arranged, and not altogether an uncircumstantial account of sir Arthur Wellesley's expedition, declared, "That on a consideration of all circumstances, as set forth in the report, they most humbly submitted their opinion, that no further military proceeding was necessary on that subject. Because some of them might differ in their sentiments respecting the fitness of the convention in the relative situation of the two armies, it was their unanimous declaration, that unquestionable zeal and firmness appeared throughout to have been exhibited by lieutenant-general sir Hew Dalrymple, sir Harry Burrard, and sir Arthur Wellesley, as well as that the ardour and gallantry of the rest of the officers and soldiers, on every occasion during the expedition, had done honour to the troops, and reflected lustre on his majesty's arms."

But his royal highness the duke of York, in a letter to sir David Dundas, president of the board of inquiry, observed, that in their report, their opinion respecting the conditions of the armistice and convention had been altogether omitted. He therefore desired that they would be pleased to take the same again into their most serious consideration. The board met again: some approved the treaties in question; others disapproved of them. A formal declaration of disapprobation on the part of the king, of both the armistice and convention, with reasons, was, however, officially communicated to sir Hew Dalrymple.

As the defeat of Junot and the deliverance of Portugal were only mediate, and not the ultimate object of the British army, it marched from Lisbon, but not till the 27th of October, nearly two months after the convention of Cintra, under the command of general sir John Moore, to the assistance of the Spanish patriots. The general's instructions were, to march through Spain with his face towards Burgos; which was to be the general rendezvous of the British troops: not only of those now under the command of that officer, but of those with which he was to be reinforced from England. And he was to combine his operations with those of the commander in chief of the Spanish armies.

The two emperors, Alexander and Napoleon, when they met at Erfurth, were each of them attended by a numerous and brilliant suite, and kings, sovereign princes, and other persons of high distinction, came day after day, to do homage to the great emperor of the West. Great was the pomp and ceremony, and most splendid the feasts and other entertainments, that took place on the occasion of this imperial and royal convention. The little town of Erfurth was astonished to witness a magnificence, that would have been admired at Paris. The first dinner was given by Bonaparte. Napoleon and Alexander held their conferences every day at ten o'clock. These being over, they rode out together, either in the same carriage or on horseback, to take a view of the adjacent country.

A negociation was entered into at Erfurth, under the mediation of Alexander, in consequence of which Napoleon engaged to evacuate the Prussian territory, as soon as the contributions should be paid up: which he graciously reduced to one-third of their total amount. And he wrote a letter to the queen of Prussia, with his own hand, in which he promised her the completion of all her wishes. He also relaxed in the severity of his restrictions and imposts on the commerce of Holland. It was easy to persuade Alexander, that the insurrection in Spain was only the natural consequence, and what was to be apprehended from the convention of the treaty of Tilsit. The garrisons of Prussia were now evacuated; and the veteran troops of France began to march from the Oder to the Ebro; while, on the other hand, forty thousand French conscripts were sent to Germany.

Another visible effect of the meeting at Erfurth was an offer of peace on the part of Russia and France to the British government. A flag of truce, with two officers, one a Frenchman, the other a Russian, arrived October 21st, at Dover. The Frenchman, by order of lord Hawkesbury, who happened then to be at Walmer Castle, was detained. The Russian messenger was allowed to proceed on the 22d to London. It was proposed, by the overture to his Britannic majesty, to enter into a negociation for a general peace, in concert with his majesty's allies, and to treat either on the basis of uti possidetis, or on any other basis consistent with justice. The king professed his readiness to enter into such a negociation in concurrence with his allies; in the number of whom he comprehended the Spanish nation. In the reply returned by France to this proposition of his majesty, the Spanish nation was described by the appellation of the "Spanish Insurgents;" and the demand for admitting the existing government of Spain, as a party to any negociation, was rejected as inadmissible and insulting. A declaration, therefore, by his majesty, was published on the 15th of December, concluding with saying, that "neither the honour of his majesty, nor the generosity of the British nation, would admit of his majesty's consenting to commence a negociation by the abandonment of a brave and loyal people, who are contending for the preservation of all that is dear to man, and whose exertions in a cause so unquestionably just, his majesty has solemnly pledged himself to sustain."

While the army of France lay inactive on the Ebro, and the passes into the mountainous province of Biscay, the provincial juntas had leisure to resolve themselves into one supreme and central junta. The forces of the patriots, including now the army of Romana, and the Spanish regiments that had been confined in hulks of ships by Junot, were divided into three, and disposed in such a manner as to form together, towards the end of October, one grand army. The eastern wing was commanded by general Joseph Palafox; the north-western, by general Blake; the centre, by general Castanos. The number under general Blake was computed at fifty-five thousand: that under general Castanos at sixty-five thousand; and that under general Palafox, at twenty thousand. General Castanos was commander in chief. Besides these there was a small army in Estramadura, and another in Catalonia. The positions of the French army remained, with some variation, nearly the same as in August; its right towards the ocean, its left on Arragon, its front on the Ebro. It was strengthened from time to time by reinforcements from France. The design of the Spaniards was, with the right and left wings of their grand army to turn the wings of the French army, whilst Castanos should make a vigorous attack, and break through their centre.

Bonaparte having ordered a levy of one hundred and sixty thousand conscripts, set troops in motion for Spain, and, provided for all that might be demanded by the contingencies of war, set out from Paris for Spain without waiting for an answer to the overture for a negociation with the British government. With his usual celerity, having set out from Rambouillet, October 30th, he arrived at Bayonne on the 3d of November, and on the 5th, accompanied by a reinforcement of twelve thousand men, he joined his brother Joseph at Vittoria.

Agreeably to the general plan of operations, general Castanos crossed the Ebro at the three points with only a shew of resistance, and he was suffered to push forward detachments, and take possession of Lerin, Viana, Capporoso, and other French posts on the left bank of the Ebro.

(d) That such an advantage had in fact been obtained, was firmly believed, when, on the arrival of the next dispatches from the army, the firing of the Park and Tower guns was heard, and that too, at a time of night very unusual, if not quite unprecedented. But how great was the surprize of the public when it was understood that the discharge of the Park and Tower guns related to a convention, signed at Cintra, by which it was, among other stipulations, agreed on, "That the English government should be at the expence of transporting the whole of the French army to any of the ports between Rochefort and L'Orient. When the army arrived in France, it was to be at liberty to serve again immediately. All the property of the army, as well as the personal property of individuals of the army, was to be sacred and untouched. It might either be carried off into France or sold in Portugal. In the latter case, full security was to be given by the British to the purchasers, that the property they had would not be taken from them, nor they themselves molested on account of the purchase!" This convention was founded on the basis of an armistice agreed upon between sir Arthur Wellesley and general Kellerman on the day after the battle of Vimeira. But the seventh article of that preliminary treaty, stipulating that the Russian fleet should be allowed to remain in the Tagus unmolested as long as it thought proper, or to return home, was afterwards rejected by sir Charles Cotton; between whom and the Russian admiral Siniavin, a convention was agreed to for the surrender of the Russian fleet to the British fleet, on the 3d of September.

The

The French did not oppose his course towards Pampeluna, any farther than was necessary to conceal their own plan of operations. Marshal Moncey, the duke of Cornegliano, was directed with the left wing of the French army to advance along the banks of the Alagon and the Ebro, and instead of opposing the passage, by presenting a weak front, to decoy general Castanos across the Ebro. The stratagem having succeeded, marshal Ney, the duke of Elchingen, with his division, passing the line of the Ebro, and moving forward with great celerity in separate columns, took the Spanish posts at Logrono and Calahorra, threw the whole country into alarm and confusion, and cut off the communication between the armies respectively under the command of Blake and Castanos.

In a series of actions from the 31st of October, the army under general Blake was driven from post to post; from Durango to Guenas; from Guenas to Valmaseda; from Valmaseda to Espinosa. In a strong position there, the Gallician army made a stand, in order to save its magazines and artillery, in vain; they were obliged to retreat with precipitation. During the conflict at Espinosa, a detachment was sent against the last retreat of the Gallicians, Reynosa. On the 11th of November, they were suddenly attacked, and forced to consult their safety by flight; throwing away their arms and colours, and abandoning their artillery. General Blake, with the remains of his broken army, took refuge in Asturias. What remained of the corps of the marquis of Romana, that had formed part of the Gallician army, fled first to St. Andero, and afterwards to Asturias. The Spaniards were pursued closely by marshal Soult, duke of Dalmatia, the van of whose army entered St. Andero on the 16th. The bishop of which city took refuge in an English frigate.

In the mean time the Estramaduran army, under the command of count Belvedere, was permitted without opposition, to advance to Burgos, of which he took possession without resistance. Here the French fell on him, routed his army, and almost annihilated it. The count, with the small remains of his army, fled to Lerma, and from thence to Aranda.

The French, having routed and dispersed the armies of the north of Spain, and of Estramadura, next fell on the central army under Castanos; and an engagement ensued at Tudela, 23d November, which fixed the fate of the campaign. Four thousand Spaniards were left dead on the field of battle, or driven into the Ebro.

By the battle of Tudela the road was laid open to Madrid. On the 29th of November, a division of the French army, under the command of general Victor, duke of Belluna, arrived at the pass of the Sierra Morena, called Puerto. It was defended by thirteen thousand men of the Spanish army of reserve, under the orders of general San Juan. In the conflict which took place at the Puerto, the Spaniards fled, leaving behind them their artillery and standards.

Advanced parties of the French cavalry appeared on the 1st of December, before Madrid; and were driven back from certain gates several times: but on the third, they were in possession of the gate of Alcala, and also of the Reteiro. The junta then hoisted a white flag. The people of Madrid pulled it down, and persisted in their design of defending the city; but this enthusiasm soon began to subside; and when they learnt that the French were fortifying themselves in the Reteiro, they retired to their respective houses.

During the night of December the 3d, a Spanish officer who had been taken prisoner at Somosierra, brought a message from general Berthier, summoning for the second time Madrid to surrender. The marquis of Castellar, captain general of Castile, sent in answer a letter to Berthier, demanding a suspension of hostilities, that he might have time for consulting the superior authorities. The superior authorities had a secret correspondence with the enemy, and had already come to a determination on the subject. When intelligence that the French had forced the passage of the Sierra Morena reached Madrid, a council was held, at which the honourable Mr. Stuart, the British envoy at Madrid, was present. Don T. Morla took the lead, and expatiated on the hopeless state of affairs; and urged the necessity of immediately capitulating for Madrid. When he sat down, another counsellor rose, and reproached Morla for his proposal. He said that this advice was more suited to a minister of Joseph Bonaparte, than to one of king Ferdinand. Two days after this discussion, Don T. Morla, together with the prince of Castel Franco, to whom the defence of the capital had been committed by the supreme junta, sent a dispatch to sir John Moore, describing the formidable Spanish force that was assembled at Madrid: and pressing him to advance, with all possible expedition to the capital. Had sir John Moore complied with their request, his army would have been thrown completely into the hands of the French.

The letter of the marquis of Castellar, sent to Berthier in the morning of the 4th, produced a peremptory summons to surrender immediately; and in the evening of the same day, Don Thomas Morla and Don Bertrando Yriate waited on Berthier, and were introduced by him to Bonaparte; who told them, that if the city did not tender its submission by five or six o'clock next morning, it would be taken by assault, and every one found with arms in his hands put to the sword. The Spanish troops in Madrid were sent off in the dead of night, by the gates of Segovia and Tudela.

Bonaparte addressed a manifesto to the Spanish nation, in which he promised them all good things if they received with sincerity Joseph for their king; if not, he would put the crown on his own head, treat them as a conquered province, and find another kingdom for his brother.

The troops that had fled from the Puerto, or gate of Guadarama, having arrived, on the 3d of December, almost under the walls of Madrid, demanded with loud cries to be led to its defence. Their commander, count San Juan, who opposed so dangerous an attempt, was massacred.

In 1809, the session of parliament was opened by commissioners, on the 19th of January, when the lord chancellor read his majesty's speech; the grand outline of which, as usual in time of war, was, that his majesty relied on his parliament for support in the prosecution of a war, which, he said, could not be terminated honourably or safely but by vigorous exertion. An address of thanks was put and carried in both houses.

On the 27th of January, colonel Wardle submitted to the house his promised motion, respecting certain abuses which had obtained in the disposal of commissions in the British army. In doing this, he said, he should make no assertion in which he was not supported by positive facts. The power of disposing of commissions in the military service of this empire had been placed in the hands of a person of high birth, power, and influence; and he was sorry to observe, that this power had been exercised to the worst of purposes. But notwithstanding the high authority and powerful influence which the commander-in-chief of this country possessed; no respect to either should induce him to swerve from his duty as a member of that house, to operate with him as a motive to screen his royal highness, (the duke of York,) in any misuse of his power or authority, from that public justice which was called for by the voice of the people. No other motive impelled him that day than a sense of public duty; for, if corruption were not attacked in a quarter where it was so formidable, the army and the country must fall the victims of its influence. It was necessary, in the first instance, he said, to put the house in possession of the true purposes for which the disposal of commissions in the army was placed in the hands of the commander-in-chief. It was for the purposes of defraying the charges of the half-pay list for the support of veteran officers, and increasing the compassionate fund, for the aid of officers' widows and orphans; and, therefore, any commissions which fell by deaths or promotions, the commander-in-chief had no right to sell or dispose of for his own private emolument, nor to appropriate for the like purpose any differences arising from the change or reduction of officers from full to half pay. He had thus explained, he believed, the nature of the power vested in the hands of the commander-in-chief; but he could bring positive proofs that such commissions had been sold, and the money applied to very different purposes from the legitimate ones required by the military usages and establishments of the country. If he could prove that those purposes were, in a variety of instances, abandoned by the commander in chief; that officers had been reduced to the half pay list without receiving the usual difference in such cases; and if he could substantiate such a violation of the rights of military officers, it was a duty he owed his constituents and his country to do so.

In the year 1803, his royal highness set up a very handsome establishment, in a fashionable quarter of the town, consisting of a superb house and elegant carriages of various descriptions, for a favourite lady of the name of Mrs. Clarke. The first fact which he should state was the case of major Tonyn, of the forty-eighth regiment, who received his commission as a captain on the 2nd of August, 1802, and was promoted to a majority in the thirty-first regiment in August, 1804. Major Tonyn was the son of a distinguished officer, and might have purchased his promotion, if he chose; but he was introduced to Mrs. Clarke by a captain of the royal waggon train; and it was agreed, that upon his appointment to a majority he should pay five hundred pounds, the money to be lodged at a house to be named, three days before he was gazetted, and then paid to a Mr. Donovan, a surgeon, in Charles Street, St. James's Square. As he should have occasion to mention Mr. Donovan again, it was necessary to state, that in 1802 he was appointed to a lieutenancy in a garrison battalion. He had never inquired what was the nature of the services he performed; but certainly no military services, for he had never been near his regiment, and seemed to have a perpetual leave of absence. This introducer was captain Huxley Sandon. This money was appropriated by Mrs. Clarke towards the purchase of an elegant service of plate from Mr. Purkis, a silversmith, the commander in chief paying the remainder. Thus it was evident that Mrs. Clarke had the power of disposing of commissions for purchase; secondly, that she received pecuniary considerations for promotions; and thirdly, that the commander in chief partook of the emoluments; and this he could prove, by the evidence of five witnesses, including the executors of Mr. Purkis.

The next fact he would adduce was that of colonel Brooke, on the 25th of July, 1805, which was transacted through a Dr. Thynne, a medical gentleman of high respectability. It was agreed between him and Mrs. Clarke, that she should receive two hundred pounds on his exchange being gazetted: the lady was extremely anxious, and said she could have an opportunity of getting two hundred pounds without calling on the commander in chief, and on the Saturday following the promotion was gazetted.

The next was the case of major Shaw, appointed deputy barrack-master general at the Cape of Good Hope. It appeared that the commander in chief had no favourable opinion of major Shaw; but Mrs. Clarke interposes: he consents to pay her one thousand pounds. Of this money he immediately paid two hundred pounds; shortly after he paid three hundred pounds; when she, finding he was backward in the payment, sent to demand the remainder; but finding no chance of receiving it, she complains to the commander in chief, who immediately put major Shaw upon the half pay list. Here was further proof, to shew that Mrs. Clarke's influence extended to the army in general, and that it operated to put any officer on the half pay list, and that the commander in chief was a direct party in her authority.

The next case to which he should advert, of the lady's influence, was that of colonel French, of the horse-guards. This gentleman was appointed to a commission for raising new levies in 1804, and the business was set on foot by Mrs. Clarke. He was introduced to her by captain Huxley Sandon, and she was to have a certain sum out of the bounty to every recruit raised, and a certain portion of patronage in the nomination of the officers. She was waited on by colonel French, of the first troop of horse-guards, and as the levy went on, she received various sums of money by colonel French, captain Huxley Sandon, Mr. Corri, and Mr. Cokayne, an eminent solicitor, in London, in the following rates, viz. for a majority, nine hundred pounds; captaincy, seven hundred pounds; lieutenancy, four hundred pounds; and ensigncy, two hundred pounds; whereas the regulated prices were respectively two thousand six hundred pounds, one thousand five hundred pounds, five hundred and fifty pounds, and four hundred pounds; and consequently all this money was lost to the half-pay compassionate fund, to put money into Mrs. Clarke's pocket.

The next instance was one in which the commander in chief himself was a direct partaker in the advantages of this traffic, by a loan to be furnished through colonel French, the writings for which were drawn by a Mr. Grant, an eminent solicitor of Barnard's Inn, for the purpose of raising three thousand pounds; but he did not receive it, because there were three thousand pounds due from government to colonel French. Hence then it was obvious that Mrs. Clarke exercised an influence in raising the military force of the country, in disposing of commands in that force, and in converting the purchase of commissions to her own private advantage.

He would next proceed to the case of captain May, of the royal African corps. He meant no reflection upon that officer. He was appointed to an ensigncy on November 28, 1806; some time after, he was made lieutenant. He had still the good fortune to remain a clerk at the desk of Mr. Greenwood, army agent. On the 15th of April, 1808, he was employed by the duke of York, and before the end of the year he was raised to a captain in the royal African corps, and the third year after his first appointment, and without seeing service; thus promoted over the heads of all the subalterns of the army, without any regard to their long service and wounds in their country's cause, though many of them had lodged this money to pay the differences on promotion. Whether the honour and interests of the British army, and the feelings of the officers, were properly to be subjected to such a system, the house of commons would judge and decide. He hoped, after what he had stated, the house of commons would not refuse to grant him a committee to inquire into those transactions: and, if they agreed, he would pledge himself to bring as evidence before them Mrs. Clarke herself, and the whole of the other persons whom he had named.

There was another circumstance in this case which he could not pass unnoticed: it was the existence of a public office in the city of London, where commissions in the army were offered to purchasers at reduced prices, and where the clerks openly and unequivocally stated, in his own presence, and in his hearing, that they were employed by the present favourite mistress of the commander in chief, Mrs. Carey; and that, in addition to commissions in the army, they were employed to dispose of places in every department of church and state; and those agents did not hesitate to state, in words and writing, that they were employed under the auspices of two of his majesty's principal ministers. Having now gone through the whole of his statement, the honourable member concluded by expressing his hope, that the house would grant him a committee to enquire into the conduct of the duke of York, in respect to the disposal of military commissions; and he moved accordingly.

Sir Francis Burdett seconded the motion; and a debate of considerable warmth and great length took place, in which the principal speakers were, the secretary at war, sir Arthur Wellesley, Mr. Yorke, sir Francis Burdett, Mr. Adam, Mr. Wilberforce, the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Wardle, lord Folkstone, Mr. secretary Canning, Mr. Whitbread, and lord Castlereagh; when the question was put, on the motion of the chancellor of the exchequer, "that the committee should be a committee of the whole house," and was carried without a division.

On the motion of Mr. Wardle, in the house of commons, on the 1st of February, the house resolved into a committee, to inquire into the conduct of his royal highness the duke of York, touching the disposal of commissions in the army,—Mr. Wharton in the chair. After a few preliminary observations from colonel Wardle, the committee proceeded to the examination of several witnesses, in the course of which a great number of instances occurred wherein Mrs. Clarke appeared to have received various sums of money from different persons for the procurement of their promotion; after which, at the proposition of the lord chancellor the committee adjourned for a few days, to give an opportunity for some material witnesses arriving in town. Suffice it to say, for it is not necessary to enter into the particulars of the examinations of the several witnesses, that for prevarication before the house, captain Huxley Sandon was committed to Newgate; and that in the course of the examination, much important evidence was adduced, merely by the cross-examinations of the attorney-general, and those who were avowedly the advocates of the commander in chief. Indeed his royal highness appears to have been more indebted for the strong parts of the case made out against him, to his friends than to colonel Wardle. Divers letters were brought to light through their means, of which the prosecutor was totally ignorant; and to justify his royal highness, general Clavering made a signal attempt, and was committed to Newgate for prevarication, having first greatly injured the cause which he hoped to defend.

On the 23rd of February, the speaker stated, that since he had come to the house, he had received a letter, the contents of which related to the inquiry now pending before the house, respecting the conduct of his royal highness the duke of York, and he wished to know whether it was the pleasure of the house that he should read it; which being being agreed to, the right honourable gentleman then announced that the letter came from his royal highness the duke of York, was signed "Frederick," addressed to the speaker, and dated Horse Guards, February 23, 1809.

On the next day, Mr. Whitbread wished to draw the attention of the house to the letter written by his royal highness, addressed to that house, and conveyed to it through the medium of the speaker. This letter appeared to Mr. Whitbread to strike at the privileges of the house, by stating, that it examined evidence which it ought not to have done. His royal highness, he said, was as competent to have written to the house in the first instance, that it ought not to institute and carry on an inquiry on such evidence as would be produced before it. And lord Henry Petty thought the question of extraordinary importance, and that the house had, by the vote of last night, (February 23,) permitted a letter to be put on the table which was an attack on their privileges.

On the 28th, Mr. Wynne made a few observations on the letter in question; after which the subject was not resumed till the 8th of March, when Mr. Wardle, having complimented the ministers, sir Francis Burdett, and lord Folkstone, said, there was nothing for which he rejoiced so much, as the manner in which his royal highness had been defended, particularly by his majesty's ministers, and the law officers of the crown. After a long and animated speech on the occasion, he concluded by moving an address to his majesty, which terminated in these words: "His majesty's faithful commons, therefore, beg leave humbly to submit to his majesty, that the duke of York ought to be deprived of the command of the army." Lord Folkstone seconded the motion; and on the division, which took place on the 15th of March, there appeared for it one hundred and twenty-three; against it three hundred and sixty-four; majority against the motion two hundred and forty-one.

On the 20th of March, the chancellor of the exchequer said, he had to communicate to the house, that his royal highness the duke of York, of his own accord, had spontaneously waited on his majesty, and resigned the high office which he had so long held, as commander in chief, into his majesty's hands. The motives for his royal highness having taken that step at this particular time appeared to him so proper, that he entertained the most sanguine hopes they would prove satisfactory to the house.—His majesty was pleased to accept his royal highness's resignation.

Lord Arpthorpe then moved a resolution, "That the duke of York having resigned, the house did not think it necessary to proceed further on the minutes of evidence taken before the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of the duke of York, as far as relates to his royal highness;" which motion was agreed to.

Thus terminated an affair, which had excited a great deal of curiosity among all ranks of people, and which, from the exalted rank of the commander in chief, had raised very opposite sensations in the breasts of many individuals.

On the 1st of March, sir Samuel Romilly moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend certain of the bankrupt laws, which being agreed to nem. con. the bill was brought in, and finally passed into a law.

On the 19th of June, Mr. Wardle brought forward a plan for the saving of nearly seventeen millions of the public money annually, which he branched out into thirty-two motions, requiring accounts of the expenditure in certain departments to be laid before the house, which were agreed to.

And, on the 21st, the parliament was prorogued by commission.

The French fleet, consisting of eight sail of the line and two frigates, was blocked up in Brest harbour by the English fleet under lord Gambier; but in the beginning of February, the latter, being compelled to quit its station on account of the prevalency of westerly winds, the French fleet effected their escape, and entered Basque roads, where they were joined by four sail of the line and two frigates. They then removed into Aix roads; where they anchored in such a manner as to afford mutual support and protection to one another, and to lie under the guns of their own fort; while, if they were not thus found to be safe from the attack of the British, they had the entrance of the river Charente open to them, into which they might escape. An attack upon them in this situation being hazardous, and requiring the most prompt display and exertion of cool and unshaken bravery, the lords of the admiralty sent lord Cochrane on the undertaking. He went in the Impérieuse, and lord Gambier received orders to employ him in an attempt to destroy the enemy's fleet, by means of fire-ships. This appointment of lord Cochrane, a junior officer, gave offence to the officers in lord Gambier's fleet; and rear-admiral Harvey, the second in command, charged lord Gambier with having recommended the appointment of lord Cochrane to this undertaking, and accompanied this charge with language disrespectful to his commander (e).

Lord Cochrane, however, answered the expectations of the lords of the admiralty. On the 10th of April a number of fire vessels and transports filled with Congreve's rockets joined lord Gambier's fleet. Immediately the preparations for the intended attack were begun. As the fitting up and management of the explosion ship were entirely intrusted to lord Cochrane, he determined that they should be complete in every respect: for this purpose he caused puncheons, placed end upwards, to be filled with one thousand five hundred barrels of gunpowder; on the tops of the puncheons nearly four hundred shells with fusees were placed, and in the intermediate spaces about three thousand hand granades. In order that the explosion might be as violent and destructive as possible, the puncheons were fastened together by cables, and kept steady and immoveable by wedges and sand rammed down between them. In this ship, dreadful even to imagine, lord Cochrane, with one lieutenant, and four seamen, committed himself. On the evening of the 11th, the fire-ships, led on by captain Woodridge, and the explosion-ship, proceeded to the attack. When they approached the enemy, they perceived a boom stretched across in front of their line, to protect them. This was soon broken; and the English advanced, undaunted and undisturbed by a heavy fire from the forts in the Isle of Aix. The French fleet, thrown into confusion, cut their cables and run on shore to avoid destruction.

Lord Cochrane approached with his explosion-ship as near to the enemy as he could, and perceiving that they had taken the alarm, set fire to the fusee, and betook himself, with his companions, to the boat. They had not left the vessel more than nine minutes before she blew up (f). Lord Cochrane had no sooner reached his own ship, than he proceeded to attack the French vessels thrown into confusion or driven on shore, and sustained their fire for some time, before any other man of war entered the harbour.

Early on the morning of the 12th, lord Gambier, in consequence of a signal from lord Cochrane, made the signal to unmoor and weigh, but was obliged to anchor again before he reached Aix roads, the wind and tide being against him. The enemy succeeded in getting six of their ships up the river Charente: four of the remaining ships were attacked by lord Cochrane in the Impérieuse, followed by the Revenge, the Indefatigable, and the Valiant, of seventy-four guns each. Lord Cochrane laid his ship alongside of the Calcutta, which had one-third more guns than the Impérieuse, and soon compelled her to surrender. He afterwards, supported by the other English men of war, attacked the Ville de Varsovie and the Aquilon; and notwithstanding our ships were exposed to a tremendous fire from the batteries of the Isle of Aix, they were also taken. It being found impossible to get these ships off, they were set fire to, after the crews were taken out. The Tonnerre, another of the French squadron, was also burnt by her own crew. The result of this brilliant and gallant atchievement was, that one ship of one hundred and twenty guns, five of seventy-four guns, and two frigates, were driven on shore, in such a manner and situation that they were either afterwards totally destroyed, or rendered useless: one of eighty, two of seventy-four, and one of fifty guns, and three frigates, were burnt, either by us or by their crews. On the 13th a constant fire was kept up on such of the French ships as had escaped up the Charente, by a bomb and the (e) In consequence of this he was brought to a court-martial at Portsmouth; and after a short trial, (the admiral having admitted the truth of the charges, and pleaded in exculpation the excess of his zeal and his impatience of restraint, where he thought he could benefit his country,) was found guilty of having used vehement and insulting language to lord Gambier. The sentence of the court was, that he should be dismissed his majesty's service.

(f) The lieutenant, who accompanied lord Cochrane, expired in the boat, through fatigue; and two of the sailors were so nearly exhausted, that their lives for some time were despaired of.

rocket rocket boats. In this hazardous operation, our whole loss amounted to thirty men killed and wounded (g).

A very short time after the enterprize, it was rumoured that lord Cochrane had expressed himself by no means satisfied with the conduct even of lord Gambier; and the latter demanded a court-martial on the whole of his conduct during the attack in Basque roads, in order that the charges of lord Cochrane might be officially and fully stated, directly met, and, if ill-founded, publicly repelled. Accordingly an order for a court-martial, to be holden in Portsmouth harbour, was issued by the lords of the admiralty, to enquire into the conduct of lord Gambier; and the court, after having deliberated on the evidence that was laid before them, determined that the charge against lord Gambier had not been proved; but that, on the contrary, his lordship's conduct, during the whole of the operations in Basque roads, "was marked by zeal, judgement, ability, and an anxious attention to the welfare of his majesty's service." They, therefore, adjudged him to be most honourably acquitted.

About the beginning of July, a Russian flotilla, in the Baltic, with a convoy of vessels laden with ammunition and provisions for their army in Finland, being alarmed at the sight of the British squadron under sir James Saumarez, took up a strong position under Pencola point. Their flanks were protected by two rocks, mounted with guns: the Russians imagined themselves here perfectly secure. Captain Martin, of the Implacable, manned the boats of four ships, which he placed under the command of lieutenant Hankey. The British seamen, amidst a well directed and destructive fire upon their boats, kept steadily on to their purpose, and never deigned to fire a gun till their boats actually touched the enemy. Then they boarded the gun-boats sword in hand, and swept away all opposition and resistance. The flotilla consisted of eight gun-boats, each mounting a thirty-two and twenty-four pounder, and armed with forty-six men: of these six were brought out, and one was sunk, and the whole of the convoy was captured. This successful achievement was however, attended with the loss of the gallant leader. After he had captured one gun-brig, lieutenant Hankey was killed as he was in the act of boarding a second. His last words were, "Huzza! push on! England for ever!" (h)

The fleet under lord Collingwood, in the Mediterranean, was likewise of great benefit to the cause of the Spaniards. Barcelona had been long besieged by them, and was reduced to such straits, for want of ammunition and provisions, that there was every reason to hope for its speedy surrender, provided the French were not able to supply it with what it so much stood in need of. This the French determined to attempt by sea; and admiral Bauden had orders to attempt the relief of Barcelona. For this purpose he sailed from Toulon, towards the end of October, with three sail of the line, four frigates, and twenty large transports. As soon as they were discovered, lord Collingwood gave orders to admiral Martin to chase them. The French line of battle ships, and one of the frigates, ran ashore between Cette and Frontignan, and were set on fire by their crews, to prevent their falling into our hands. The transports separated from the men of war, and took shelter in the bay of Rosas, where, under the shelter of an armed store-ship, two bombards, and a xebeck, they were attacked and destroyed. In this action we had fifteen killed and fifty-five wounded.

In the West Indies it was deemed adviseable to attempt the reduction of Martinique, which had long been a shelter for privateers. The principal place which the enemy defended was Mount Sourrier; and this was absolutely necessary to gain possession of, that our troops might carry on their operations against Fort Bourbon. Accordingly there was some hard fighting at Mount Sourrier; and the enemy were driven from this strong position; and in twenty-seven days from the departure of the expedition from Barbadoes, the whole island of Martinique was brought under the power of the English.

About the same time, captain Yeo, of the navy, at the head of some English and Portuguese troops, attacked the French settlement of Cayenne. No resistance appears to have been made; and the colony was surrendered to the united forces of Great Britain and Portugal. From the tenure of several of the articles of capitulation, the prince regent is represented as the future possessor of the colony.

In the beginning of July, general Carmichael sailed from Jamaica, for the purpose of co-operating with the Spaniards in the reduction of the city of Saint Domingo. At first, the French general Barquier, who commanded the city, expressed his determination to abide by his instructions, which ordered him not to surrender; but when general Carmichael made preparations to carry the place by assault, the governor capitulated. The garrison were allowed to march out with the honours of war: the officers were sent to France on their parole, and the private soldiers were considered as prisoners of war (i).

In the East Indies there appeared, at one time, a probability that a rupture would have taken place between us and Persia. Bonaparte had dispatched not only diplomatic agents, but several French officers, to the Persian court. They had been received with so much favour, that lord Minto seems to have prepared for an expedition against that empire: but in order to avert the necessity of this measure, and to destroy the French influence, sir Harford Jones was sent to the Persian court. Respecting the measures pursued by him, there seems to be some obscurity; but he procured the mission of a Persian ambassador to the court of St. James.

Our differences with America, which had subsisted for some time, instead of being brought to an amicable termination, this year became wider and more confirmed. All the circumstances and causes which tended to this unfortunate issue are not yet distinctly known. The American government, however, was highly offended at the repeated assertion made by Mr. Jackson, that they had been put in possession of Mr. Erskine's instructions; and at length officially announced to him, that as he did not appear to be commissioned or empowered to treat on the points in dispute between the two governments, but seemed to have been sent solely for the purpose of charging the government of the United States with having formed an arrangement which they knew at the time was unauthorized, and would not be sanctioned by the British cabinet, they must decline all further communication with him.

In the beginning of June, sir John Stewart, commander of the British army in Sicily, determined to attempt the invasion of the south of Italy, and the capture of the city of Naples. For these purposes he prepared an expedition on as large and extensive a scale as his means would allow. He embarked with fifteen thousand British troops; and he was soon afterwards joined by a body of Sicilian forces, under the command of one of the royal princes. The king of Sardinia had undertaken to aid this expedition with six thousand men; but from some unexplained cause they never arrived. The British general detached a brigade to reduce Lower Calabria, and after its reduction to join him over land. This brigade appears to have partly succeeded in the object for which they were dispatched, as they took possession of the line of posts which the French had formed directly opposite Messina, and of which therefore it was of considerable importance to deprive them. The (g) In the course of this enterprize lord Cochrane displayed his humanity in as signal and noble a manner as he did his courage. A captain of one of the French seventy-fours, when delivering his sword to his lordship, lamented that the conflagration of his ship, which was just about to take place, would destroy all the property he possessed. On hearing this, lord Cochrane instantly went into the boat, along with him, in order, if possible, to save some of it; but, unfortunately, his lordship's humane intentions were frustrated in a most shocking manner. As they passed a French ship which was on fire, her loaded guns went off, and one of them killed the captain, by the side of his generous conqueror.

(h) In this severe contest we had seventeen killed and thirty-seven wounded. The Russians suffered much more dreadfully; as sixty-three of them were killed, and one hundred and twenty-four were taken prisoners, among whom were fifty-four wounded; besides several that were drowned in attempting to make their escape from the vessels.

(i) The island of Jamaica discovered, soon after the abolition of the slave trade, symptoms of dissatisfaction with the mother country. The principal inhabitants were displeased, because they conceived that, in abolishing the slave trade, the mother country had interfered with the privileges and rights of their own provincial assembly. In this state of mind, it was scarcely to be hoped that fresh causes of disgust and dissatisfaction would not either actually arise, or be imagined to exist. During a mutiny which took place in a negro corps, two officers were slain. As no coroner's inquest was held, the legislature of the island requested the governor to lay before them the military proceedings which had been carried on against the offenders. This the commander in chief peremptorily refused; at the same time prohibiting all military persons from answering any questions that might be put to them by the legislative body, on the subject of the mutiny. At length, finding that the assembly would not carry on the business of the island, the governor prorogued it in a short speech, wherein he stated his determination to bring the circumstances and nature of the dispute before the British government. The difference, however, was afterwards made up, or rather permitted on both sides to die away.

allies

DESTRUCTION OF A FRENCH SQUADRON by ADMIRAL MARTIN in the
BAY OF ROSAS
Corbould delin.
C. Warre sculp.
Published March 12 1812 by J. Stratford 112 Holborn Hill allies had great success in the beginning, and in a short period they took one thousand five hundred regular troops, and one hundred pieces of ordnance. But it was soon found that the projected attempt on the continent and on the city of Naples must be abandoned; for, besides a large regular force which Murat had assembled for the protection of his dominions and capital, a large body of national guards had been formed and embodied. Sir John Stewart, however, dispatched a body of troops to take possession of Scylla castle. The attempt to reduce this important fortress was attended, in the first instance, with disappointment: for a very superior force of the enemy suddenly made their appearance, and compelled the British detachment precipitately to raise the siege and embark for Messina. A few days afterwards the enemy retreated again from the coast, after having blown up the works of Scylla. Our troops on taking possession of it not only regained their captured stores, but an immense quantity of stores and ordnance left by the enemy. The enemy, however, again returned as suddenly and unexpectedly as they had quitted the fortress, and, after four days' possession, the British were forced finally and completely to abandon it, as well as all their other conquests.

Soon after the commencement of the war between France and Austria, the British ministry began to make preparations for a very large and formidable expedition. Immense bodies of troops were marched from different parts of the kingdom to the coasts of Kent and Hampshire, from which the embarkation was to take place. The intelligence that Bonaparte, after an unsuccessful attempt to drive the archduke from his position, had been compelled to recross the Danube with enormous loss, and that the insurgents in Germany had gained fresh spirit and confidence, and a considerable accession of strength from this defeat, induced the British ministry to hasten the expedition, and to render it still more formidable and complete than they had at first intended (k). Although ministers endeavoured to keep the precise object of this expedition a profound secret, yet long before it sailed, the point of attack was known, not only here, but even to our enemies. Indeed almost the first clear and positive notice of the object on which it was about to be sent, appeared in the French newspapers. News was received, previous to the sailing of the expedition, that Austria found it necessary to enter into an armistice with France, the nature of which proved that she was unable to continue the war. This necessarily confined the object of the expedition to the occupation of the islands at the mouth of the Scheldt, and the destruction or capture of the French ships of war.

After the troops were all embarked, and the transports and men of war were on the point of sailing, a contrary wind set in, and blew so strongly and steadily as to detain the fleet in the Downs nearly a fortnight. At length, on the 28th and 29th of July, it sailed. On the arrival of the army in the islands of Walcheren and South Beveland, in the mouth of the Scheldt, they found the enemy not disposed to make any resistance except in Flushing. This place lord Chatham, who was appointed commander-in-chief, immediately proceeded to invest. By the capitulation of Middleburgh, it appeared that it was the design of our government to retain a permanent occupation of the island of Walcheren.

The conquest of Flushing was not of such easy and speedy achievement as was at first expected: by some neglect or remissness on the part of our commander, the enemy were enabled to send across from the opposite coast considerable reinforcements; and though they were defeated in every sortie they made, owing to the superiority of numbers in the British army, they were enabled to hold out so long, that, on the surrender of the place, it was not deemed advisable to proceed up the Scheldt.

Flushing was invested on the 1st of August, on the 13th the batteries were completed, and the frigates and smaller vessels having taken their respective stations, the bombardment commenced that day. The town suffered dreadfully, especially from the effects of Congreve's rockets; the fortifications were but little injured. General Monnet, who commanded, attempted an inundation of the island; but it was not carried to such a length as materially to retard or impede our military offensive operations. On the 14th of August the line of battle ships cannonaded the town for some hours: the enemy's fire ceased; and a summons was sent in: but some delay and difficulty having arisen, it is supposed from general Monnet's wish either to include some Irish troops in the capitulation, or to obtain time for escape, the attack recommenced, and an advanced post was carried by the bayonet. The next day the enemy demanded a suspension of arms, which was succeeded by the surrender of the town; and the garrison, amounting to more than four thousand men, were made prisoners of war.

Soon after the surrender of Flushing, a rumour reached England, that no ulterior operations would be undertaken. Nothing, however, appears to have been decided till the 27th of August, when sir Richard Strachan, who commanded the fleet, having gone in person to learn lord Chatham's plans, was told that his lordship had come to a determination not to advance. Every preparation had been made to oppose the passage both of our army and navy; and a numerous army had been collected for the defence of Antwerp and the shipping; and preparations had been made for the purpose of conveying the ships so high up the river, as to put them beyond the possible reach either of our navy or army.

Lord Chatham with the greater number of the troops returned to England. The remainder found it expedient to give up all their conquests, except the island of Walcheren. This it was resolved to keep, if possible, for the purpose both of shutting up the mouth of the Scheldt, and thus preventing the sailing of the French fleet, and of enabling our merchants to introduce British manufactures into Holland. But from this island, the sole fruit of a most expensive expedition, we were doomed to be driven by an enemy more cruel and destructive than the French. It was notoriously unhealthy, and from the nature of its situation and climate, it would prove a grave to our troops. Here, however, they were ordered to remain, and consequently were doomed to perish. When the fatal malady appeared to be suspending its ravages, they resolved to retain possession of the island. At an enormous expence they sent out materials for building barracks and repairing the fortifications; provisions and even water for the troops were obliged to be furnished from England. The malady continued and increased: they paused in their proceedings, and seemed inclined to evacuate the island. The frost set in; the deaths were not so numerous. Again they clung to their dearly bought conquest. At length, after by far the greater proportion of our forces had either died of the pestilential disease, or been rendered by it incapable of performing their duty, the fortifications, which had been repaired at a great expence, were destroyed; and the island was evacuated, in the sight of an enemy, who, knowing that the ravages of disease would render any attack upon us unnecessary, took no measures to expel us from our fatal conquest (l).

The failure of the expedition against Walcheren called forth

(k) Perhaps at no period within the recollection of the present generation, had such a numerous body of troops been collected for the purpose of invading the continent: they amounted to upwards of forty thousand men; and their operations were to be assisted by the powerful aid of between twenty and thirty sail of the line, besides a great number of frigates, gun-boats, bombs, &c.

(l) It was expected by many people that ministers would perceive the necessity of instituting some inquiry into the causes of the failure of the expedition to Walcheren; or at least that they would endeavour to shift the blame from themselves to the earl of Chatham. But no disposition or attempt of that kind was manifested. The people were therefore grieved and surprized to see undoubted signs of the determination of his majesty's ministers to let the conduct of the earl of Chatham go uncensured and unexamined. A British commander, with nearly fifty thousand men at his disposal, had barely and slowly accomplished the capture of one fortified place; before which he had needlessly loitered so long, as to render all further enterprize useless or extremely hazardous. With means more than sufficient for the accomplishment of all he was sent to perform, he had failed in achieving any conquest of real benefit to his country or of permanent injury to the enemy. Yet he was received on his return as if he had not disappointed the expectations of the nation, nor wasted the blood of her soldiers, nor tarnished the honour of her arms; while the man who had defended Flushing so long against our immense force was declared by the military tribunals of France deserving of death, for having surrendered it before an assailable breach was made in the walls.

As there appeared to be no disposition on the part of ministers to institute any inquiry into the causes of the failure and the calamities of the expedition to the Scheldt, the common council of the city of London at length determined to address his majesty on the subject; and at the same time to express to him their indignant sense of the disgraceful squabbles that had taken place among his servants. A strong address to this effect was accordingly moved and carried, but only by the casting voice of the lord mayor. As the language and tone of this address were by no means acceptable to ministers, the party attached to them in the common council called another meeting, in which, after a long and warm debate, they succeeded in substituting an address less offensive and harsh. To the address, even when thus rendered palatable, his majesty's forth the disputes of the British cabinet into a public act of a most disgraceful nature. On the 22d of September a duel took place between lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning, two members of his majesty's cabinet, holding the highest official situations in the state, the former being secretary for the colonial department, and the latter secretary for foreign affairs. The first fire was without effect; and as the nature of the difference did not appear to the combatants to admit of explanation or apology, they fired at each other a second time, when Mr. Canning received his antagonist's bullet in his right thigh (m).

Lord Castlereagh made serious charges against Mr. Canning, equally implicating him as a gentleman and a public minister, therefore the nation naturally expected a prompt, if not a satisfactory reply. But nearly a month elapsed from the time of the duel before Mr. Canning entered on his defence. In the mean time the ministry was completely broken up. The duke of Portland gave in his resignation, on account of his age and infirmities; and lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning resigned, but not officially and formally till after the duel had taken place.

On the day after the duel took place, Mr. Perceval, on whom, in consequence of the resignation of the duke of Portland, the ostensible as well as the real government of the country and superintendence of his majesty's councils had fallen, wrote to earl Grey and lord Grenville, for the purpose of inducing them to come into administration. In it Mr. Perceval stated to the noble lords, that his majesty had authorized lord Liverpool and himself to communicate with them, "for the purpose of forming an extended and combined administration." These noblemen refused, and application was at length made to the marquis of Wellesley. This nobleman was in Spain, whither he had gone for the purpose of infusing a portion of his energy and activity into the supreme junta. He did not, however, succeed in the object of his mission; and it was believed that he might be more advantageously employed at home, in vivifying and connecting the discordant materials of which Mr. Perceval was compelled to form his ministry. He himself took the offices of first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. The marquis of Wellesley succeeded Mr. Canning as secretary of state for the foreign department; lord Liverpool was transferred from the home to the war department; and Mr. Ryder was appointed to succeed lord Liverpool. Lord Palmerston was at the same time appointed secretary at war, in the room of sir James Pulteney.

His majesty having this year entered into the fiftieth year of his reign, the circumstance was celebrated by keeping the day of his accession as a jubilee.

In resuming our account of the affairs of Spain and Portugal, the first object that demands our attention embraces the march and operations of the British army under sir John Moore. This army consisted of the troops which marched from Portugal under sir John Moore, and those which were sent from England under sir David Baird. The latter arrived at Corunna on the 13th of October, 1806, and was astonished and disappointed to find that the junta of Gallicia refused him permission to land his troops. When at last he was permitted to land them, his reception was so extremely cold, that he was disposed to doubt whether the Spanish government really wished for the co-operation of the British. The same impression was made on sir John Moore, when he arrived at Salamanca on the 13th of November: he found so little preparation made for the reception or accommodation of his army, that he wrote to the British minister at Madrid, desiring him plainly to tell the Spanish government, that if they expected his army to advance they must pay more attention to its wants. He had been officially informed that his entry into Spain would be covered by sixty or seventy thousand men; whereas when he had got so far as to be within three marches of the French army, not even a Spanish piquet had appeared to protect his front. At this critical time the Spanish general Blake was defeated, and a report reached sir David Baird that the French were advancing upon his division in two directions, so as to threaten to surround him. He consequently prepared to retreat upon Corunna; but sir John Moore, having ascertained that the report was unfounded, ordered sir David Baird to advance, in order if possible to form a junction with him. On the 28th of November sir John Moore received information that Castanos was completely defeated. No army now remained against which the whole French force might be directed, except the British; and it was vain to expect that they, even had they been united, could have resisted or checked the enemy. Sir John Moore therefore determined to fall back on Portugal, to hasten the junction of general Hope, who had gone on towards Madrid, and to order sir David Baird to regain Corunna as expeditiously as possible; and from the events which afterwards took place, there is much reason to lament that the determination was afterwards changed.

All the principal Spanish armies were beaten and dispersed. A week had elapsed since the army of Castanos had suffered a total defeat on the Ebro. Burgos was in possession of the French; and Valladolid had been entered and occupied by the cavalry. A reinforcement, amounting to nearly thirty thousand, was advancing on the side of Biscay. The French thus numerous, having driven before them the Spanish armies, found nothing to oppose their plans, whether they were directed to the immediate attack of the British army or to the occupation of Madrid.

After the main body of the army had been joined by general Hope's division, they advanced towards Valladolid, in order to have the corps under sir David Baird in their rear. Before, however, they had proceeded a day's march on this route, sir John Moore learnt by an intercepted dispatch, that Bonaparte was advancing towards Lisbon, and that a body of eighteen thousand men under Soult was posted at Saldanha. The British general immediately resolved to attempt the attack of Soult's corps: but it does not seem to have struck sir John Moore that Soult was posted with this comparatively small body of men, for the purpose of enticing the British army further into Spain, while Bonaparte in person, with his whole disposable force, endeavoured to place himself between the British army and the route of their retreat towards Portugal and the sea. Sir John Moore, therefore, quitted the route towards Valladolid, as soon as he heard that Soult was at Saldanha, and, by a movement on the left having effected his junction with sir David Baird, advanced by rapid marches to the Carrion. Here the advanced post of the two armies first met; and the superiority of the British cavalry was eminently displayed in a most brilliant and successful skirmish. But just as sir John Moore had issued orders for the main body of his army to commence a general attack, he received information that Bonaparte in person had left Madrid with his army in order to get into the rear of the British; that the army which had been stationed at Talavera had moved forward to Salamanca; and that Soult himself had received strong reinforcements. There was now no alternative, nor any time to be lost. Retreat was become indispensably necessary: the only difficulty and doubt lay in the route that ought to be pursued.

The situation of the British at this time was most dreadful. Their provisions were scanty, or procured with great labour and in an irregular manner: the waggons, in which were their magazines, baggage and stores, were often deserted in the night time by the Spanish drivers, terrified at the approach of the French; the bullocks and mules by which they were drawn would not move, except by the native drivers: it was therefore often necessary to destroy the provisions and stores, in order that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. He then sent off dispatches to sir Samuel Hood at Vigo, to send round the transports to Corunna, on which place, as three long marches nearer than Vigo, he thought it preferable to direct his retreat.

Marshal Soult did not chuse to attack the British in the strong jesty's reply was very short and dry. He expressed his regret, that the expedition to the Scheldt had accomplished a part only of the objects for which it was sent out, but he did not judge it necessary to direct any military inquiry into the conduct of his commanders by sea or land, in this conjoint service. Parliament, however, might ask for such information, or take such measures, as they should judge most conducive to the public good. This reply is not only short, but it is also unsatisfactory, and by no means of easy comprehension.

(m) This duel was preceded and immediately occasioned by a letter from lord Castlereagh to Mr. Canning. In this letter his lordship accuses Mr. Canning of having clandestinely endeavoured to procure his removal from his situation, and of having obtained a positive promise to that effect from the duke of Portland. His lordship declares that he would not have deemed the conduct of Mr. Canning improper or unfair towards himself, if he had not concealed his intention from his lordship, who, as the person most interested, ought explicitly, and at first, to have been made acquainted with Mr. Canning's proposal for his removal. On the contrary, Mr. Canning, notwithstanding he had declared his conviction that lord Castlereagh was unfit for his situation, and had thereupon prevailed upon the duke of Portland to consent to his removal, continued to treat his lordship as if he still possessed his confidence and good opinion, and permitted a minister, whom he had denounced to the premier as incapable, to plan and carry into execution the most expensive and formidable expedition perhaps ever sent from the British shores.

DEATH OF SIR JOHN MOORE
AT THE BATTLE OF CORUNNA.

strong position they now occupied near Lugo; sir John Moore, not judging it safe either to act offensively or to delay his retreat any longer, quitted his ground in the night, leaving fires burning to deceive the enemy. The French did not discover the retreat till after day-light, so that the British army got the start of them considerably.

On the 11th of January the whole of the British reached Corunna, except one division, which had been dispatched to Vigo. But unfortunately the transports from the latter port were not yet arrived, and the French army were seen the next morning approaching the town. The English had been obliged to sacrifice most of their baggage, and some of their artillery; the greater number of their horses had been put to death, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy.

The French made only partial indications of attack till the noon of the 16th of January, when they began to place some guns in the front of the right and left of their line, and to follow up this preparatory movement by a rapid attack upon the division of general Baird. When the enemy's line were first getting under arms, sir John Moore was employed in visiting the outposts, and in explaining his plans to the general officers. As soon as he was informed of the hostile indications of the French, he flew to the field, expressing his regret, that the advanced time of the day would not allow the British army to reap all the advantages of a victory which he regarded as certain. But the career of this gallant general was near its end: a cannon ball struck the left shoulder of sir John Moore, and beat him to the ground. For a few moments it was hoped he was rather stunned than materially hurt by the shot; but it was soon discovered that he was mortally wounded, and he was immediately carried from the field of battle.

The soldiers, although they knew that their general was carried off, continued to fight with confidence and valour. The attack of the French upon the right of our army was completely repulsed, and in their turn they were obliged to draw back their left flank entirely, in order to prevent it from being turned. At five in the evening the light began to fail. The British army lost, in killed and wounded, between seven and eight hundred men.

General Hope, on whom the command devolved, when sir John Moore (n) was killed and sir David Baird wounded, thought it advisable to proceed in the embarkation of his troops, for which, indeed the preparatory measures had been taken by sir John Moore. Accordingly about ten o'clock at night the troops quitted their position, and marched into Corunna, strong piquets being left to guard the ground, and to give notice of the approach of the enemy. The embarkation immediately commenced, and before day-light the whole of the army, with the exception of the rear guard, were on board the ships. In the course of the day after the battle general Hill's corps de reserve, the sick and wounded, and the rear guard, were safely embarked, in the view of the enemy, who offered no molestation or hindrance. The brigade under general Craufurd, which, separating from the main army, had proceeded towards Vigo, arrived after a most fatiguing and harassing march at that port, where fortunately they found ready a sufficient number of transports to take them on board and convey them to England.

When the British army had retreated from the peninsula, the attention and movements of the French were principally directed to the pursuit and discomfiture of the Spanish corps which still occupied the centre of the kingdom. Accordingly in the centre of Spain the duke of Belluno attacked and defeated one of the divisions of the duke del Infantado's army, under the command of Venegas: the loss of the Spanish in this affair was not great, as they offered no obstinate nor continued resistance to the French forces, but fled and dispersed after a short and ineffectual combat. After the engagement, the duke del Infantado crossed the province of Valencia, and took the route to Grenada.

While Madrid opened its gates to the French, Saragossa compelled the enemy to fly from before its walls with great slaughter; and when again besieged by a more numerous and better provided army, it did not yield, till the ravages of disease had broken the spirit and thinned the number of its inhabitants, to a great degree. The second siege commenced early in January; and on the 21st of the following month it was compelled to capitulate.

The first place in Portugal against which the French directed their efforts was Oporto, at this time defended by twenty-four thousand men, and more than two hundred pieces of cannon: notwithstanding which, the French made themselves masters of it with little loss, after a short and feeble resistance. About the same time they advanced against Chaves. General Francisco de Silviera who commanded there, retired on their approach; but having collected a more adequate force, he advanced again, and retook Chaves, with twelve pieces of artillery and one thousand five hundred prisoners.

The situation of marshal Soult who commanded the French army that had taken possession of Oporto, was rendered critical and hazardous by the successful operations of the patriots in Gallicia. Assisted by two British frigates, the Lively and Venus, they compelled the garrison of Vigo, consisting of one thousand five hundred men, to surrender, and afterwards drove the enemy from the towns of Tuy and Viana.

The only engagement worthy of notice, took place at Medellin between marshal Victor and general Cuesta; the latter general found Victor's division, consisting of about twenty thousand foot and three thousand cavalry, drawn up in front of Medellin. Against the enemy Cuesta determined to commence a rapid and general attack. The left wing of the Spanish infantry advanced within pistol shot of the French; the first battery was already taken: the cavalry of the enemy made a charge in order to regain possession of it; and general Cuesta was shortly afterwards obliged to retreat. The loss of the Spaniards in this engagement was very severe: upwards of one hundred and seventy officers were either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners; and the loss in rank and file bore rather more than the usual proportion to this number of officers.

To carry into effect the promise of assistance which the British ministry had bound themselves to afford to the patriots, and to free Portugal from the French forces, sir Arthur Wellesley was dispatched to that country with an army, which, though not very numerous, was well equipped and provided, and was deemed by the general himself perfectly equal to drive the enemy from Portugal, and to defend it from any future attacks they might make against it. The situation of Soult indeed began to be very hazardous: cut off as he was from any immediate and effectual communication and support, and dependent for the supply of his army upon an exhausted and hostile country, he attempted to force a passage into Spain by the route of Zamora; but not being able to effect it, after five days obstinate fighting, he was obliged again to retreat back upon Oporto. At length after several partial battles, in which the French were uniformly unsuccessful, they retired hastily towards Amaranthe, leaving behind them several prisoners and five pieces of cannon. In order to render his flight more rapid and successful, Soult was under the necessity of abandoning the greater part of his artillery and baggage; and sir Arthur Wellesley was compelled to give up the pursuit, in order to protect Lisbon and its vicinity from marshal Victor.

In the mean time the affairs of the patriots were chequered with alternate success and disaster in the greater part of Spain; but in Gallicia the success, at least for a season, preponderated. Their advantages, however, were in some degree counterbalanced by the recapture of St. Andero. This town, destined to frequent capture and recapture, and of great importance both to the patriots and the French, on account of its situation, was taken by general Ballasteros on the 10th of June. On that very night the French general Bannet, at the head of a large body of troops, came suddenly and unexpectedly upon it, and after having gained possession of it, put the whole Spanish garrison, amounting to five thousand men, to the sword. General Ballasteros at first eluded the search of the enemy, but was afterwards taken.

In the north-east of Spain, the army of general Blake made an attempt to regain possession of Saragossa; in which he not only completely failed, but exposed his army by it to a fatal and inglorious defeat at Belchite. He was opposed by the French general Suchet, who was completely successful; and in a short time, only the general and officers were left to oppose the enemy. In their flight the Spaniards not merely abandoned their baggages, but they even threw away their arms. The fruits of this victory to the French, were nine pieces of cannon, immense quantities of provisions, stores and ammunition, and upwards of three thousand prisoners. The loss of the French was very trifling, not exceeding forty killed and two hundred wounded.

(n) As sir John Moore had repeatedly declared his wish to colonel Anderson to be buried where he had fallen, if it should be his lot to be killed in battle, it was determined to bury his body on the rampart of the citadel of Corunna. Accordingly at eight o'clock in the morning it was deposited, uncoffined and undressed, in a grave hastily dug by some soldiers. Some months afterwards, when the Spaniards again got possession of Corunna, the marquis de Romana ordered his body to be taken up, and properly interred in the citadel; and over the tomb a short and simple inscription was graven.

Joseph Bonaparte joined the army under marshal Victor, bringing with him considerable reinforcements from general Sebastiani's division. Victor with his army thus strengthened, and amounting to about thirty-five thousand men, was stationed in the neighbourhood of Talavera, and along the banks of the river Alberche. He had taken up this position for the purpose of opposing the march of the united British and Spanish armies against Madrid. The Spanish army, under the immediate command of Cuesta, amounted to thirty-eight thousand men. The force of Venegas, who had again advanced as far as Madrilejos, consisted of seven thousand cavalry, and a proportionate number of infantry. On the 20th of July a complete junction of the British and Spanish armies had taken place; and immediate measures were taken to carry into effect the plan of operations agreed upon by sir Arthur Wellesley and general Cuesta. The French forces then attacked the advanced guard of general Cuesta, and obliged him to fall back upon the British, with very considerable loss. They then attacked the united British and Spanish armies, with their Portuguese auxiliaries; but being unsuccessful, retreated across the Alberche, in the most regular order; having lost twenty pieces of cannon and a few prisoners. The loss of the British was, in killed, wounded, and missing, nearly six thousand men; among the killed were major-general Mackenzie and brigadier-general Langworth.

Shortly after, however, Soult, Ney, and Mortier, having formed a junction, advanced through Estramadura, and were soon in the rear of the British. There was no time for delay or hesitation: the army could be saved only by promptly adopting the most active measures; and on the 3d of August the British left Talavera, and marched to Oropesa: on the evening of that day, sir Arthur Wellesley received information that Cuesta was obliged to leave Talavera immediately, and let most of the wounded and sick fall into the hands of the French, from the want of means of conveyance. The most rapid retreat was now indispensably requisite. He therefore judged it expedient to retreat to Badajoz. Here during the remainder of the year his army remained not only inactive, but exposed from the unhealthiness of the situation to the ravages of a fatal disorder.

General Augereau assumed the command of the French army which was besieging Gerona, defeated general Blake, and took the city, after a vigorous defence. The Spaniards in their turn were successful against the French at Zamanes; but Joseph Bonaparte completely defeated the Spanish army of the centre, (which was destined to attack Madrid,) at Ocana, on the 19th of November.

Towards the end of March and the beginning of April, preparations for war were carried on by both the French and Austrians with uncommon vigour. The court of Vienna divided its army into nine corps, which were commanded by the archdukes, and by generals Lichtenstein, Rosenberg, Klenau, and Bellegarde. The archduke Charles was appointed generalissimo, and invested with the highest and most unlimited powers ever granted to an Austrian commander. Large bodies of reserve were established and regularly trained, for the purpose of supplying the losses of war with troops in no small degree instructed in its duties. The students of the universities and the high schools manifested their zeal for their country, by enrolling themselves in separate corps for the defence of the capital.

The Austrians assembled four armies. One was stationed in Bohemia, threatening the territories of the king of Saxony; another was collected in the southern provinces of the empire, for the purpose of supporting the Tyrolese, in case they should revolt against the Bavarians, and of watching and keeping in check the French army of Italy; the third was stationed near Saltzburgh, for the purpose of either acting separately, or in conjunction with the fourth grand army, which, under the command of the archduke Charles, threatened the invasion of Bavaria, from its position between the Inn and the Iller.

The force on which Bonaparte principally relied at the commencement of the war, consisted of the troops of Bavaria, Wirtemburg, and the confederation of the Rhine. The Bavarian was formed in three divisions; the duke of Dantzic assumed the temporary command of it and the other allied troops till the arrival of Bonaparte. He established a chain of advanced posts along the banks of the Iser. In the mean time the whole of the north and west of Germany and the interior of France was stripped of troops, which proceeded by forced and rapid marches towards the Danube. It does not appear that Bonaparte drew any forces out of Spain, except the imperial guard. On the side of Italy, prince Eugene, the viceroy of that country, had concentrated a formidable army. The greater number of the Saxon troops were stationed near Dresden, in order to protect their capital from the Austrian army in Bohemia. They were commanded by the prince of Ponte Corvo.

Before the actual commencement of hostilities, the archduke Charles issued a proclamation of war in the form of an address to the soldiers of Austria. And on the 9th of April, having established his staff and head-quarters at Lintz, he sent formal notice to the French general commanding in Bavaria, that he had received orders from the emperor of Austria to advance with the troops under his command, and to treat as enemies all who should oppose him. In consequence of this notice, the king of Bavaria quitted his capital, and repaired to Augsburgh. On the 10th of the same month the Austrians, having thrown a bridge of boats over the Inn, between Brannau and Schardinig, crossed that river, and advanced slowly into Bavaria.

On the 12th of April the duke of Auerstadt (Massena) published a proclamation to his army, in which he treated the Austrian proclamation as beneath his notice, from the abuse and scurrility, which, he said, it contained.

Information that the Austrians had crossed the Inn having been conveyed to Paris by the telegraph, Bonaparte left that city on the 12th of April, and arrived at Donawerth on the 17th, from which place he removed his head-quarters to Ingolstadt on the following day. Movements immediately began to take place among the French armies, while the Austrians endeavoured to out-manœuvre them at Landshut, and surprize them in their march towards Ratisbon.

On the 19th the duke of Auerstadt advanced to the village of Pressing, where he met a division of the Austrian army; and an engagement immediately took place, which ended in the defeat of the latter. On the same day another French corps attacked an Austrian division in front, while the Bavarian troops under the command of the duke of Dantzic fell upon their rear. The French in this action were equally successful.

The archduke Louis and general Keller had very imprudently drawn their divisions to such a distance from the other corps of the Austrian army, that they at once presented a weak point of attack to the French, cut themselves off from all support, and exposed the troops under the archduke Charles to destruction. Bonaparte resolved to profit by this mistake. While the adjoining corps of the Austrians, who from their situation were most likely to support the archduke Louis, were kept in check by the duke of Auerstadt, he himself, at the head of the troops of Bavaria and Wirtemburg, assisted by two French divisions, attacked the archduke's corps in front. At the same time the communication of this corps was completely cut off by a manœuvre of the duke of Rivoli, who, passing by Freyberg, proceeded to the rear of the Austrian army. As the imperial guards were not yet arrived from Spain, Bonaparte assigned the post of honour to the troops of Bavaria and Wirtemburg. He placed himself at their head, and gave the signal for battle. A brigade of light infantry, two batteries of horse artillery, and nearly the whole of the cavalry commenced the attack: the Austrians were quickly dislodged from their position; and the infantry, chiefly composed of the troops of Wirtemburg and Bavaria, completed the defeat of the Austrians: compelled on all sides to fall back, they retreated with great rapidity and confusion. In this battle the French took eight standards, twelve pieces of cannon, and eighteen thousand prisoners.

The flank of the Austrian army having been completely laid open by the battle of Ebensberg, Bonaparte, pursuing his victory, pushed immediately forward to Landshut. The Austrian cavalry, having formed before the city, were attacked and driven back by the duke of Istria: the town was taken, and along with it thirty pieces of cannon, nine thousand sand prisoners, and the hospitals and magazines which the Austrians had established in that quarter.

sand

In the mean time the main Austrian army, under the immediate command of the archduke Charles, having made a rapid descent upon the Danube, in conjunction with the Bohemian army under general Kollowarth, entered Ratisbon, and took prisoners one thousand French, who had been left to guard the bridge at that place. Immediately afterwards he crossed to the right bank of the Danube, and occupied the very position in which his brother the archduke Louis had been beaten on the 20th. Bonaparte left the banks of the Iser, and marched with such celerity, that at two o'clock on the 22d of April he arrived opposite Eckmuhl, where the four corps of the Austrian army, amounting to one hundred and ten thousand men, were posted.

Bonaparte's military eye immediately perceived that the left wing of the Austrian army was disadvantageously posted. This wing he ordered the duke of Montebello to attack: he succeeded in turning it, while the front of the Austrians was opposed to the main body of the French. The contest was long and obstinate; and was not entirely terminated till night; when the army of the archduke, turned on their left, and driven from all their positions, were compelled to retreat. A large body of them, endeavouring to make a stand, under the cover of some woods near Ratisbon, were driven into the plain, and suffered dreadfully from the French cavalry. An attempt was made to cover the retreat of the main body by the cavalry; but this was equally unsuccessful: the covering corps were attacked on both wings, and obliged to seek safety in flight. The archduke Charles was nearly taken prisoner, but escaped through the fleetness of his horse.

When the extreme darkness of the night had rendered it impossible for the French to continue the pursuit, the broken and scattered divisions of the Austrian army collected in Ratisbon. Here they endeavoured to make a stand; but were compelled to give way: eight thousand of the Austrians were cut to pieces; the remainder of those who were posted without the city fled across the Danube. The city itself was still defended, but not long; for the French entered it through a breach in the fortifications. Six Austrian regiments who were in it were either cut to pieces or taken prisoners; and the remainder not having had time, from the mode in which the enemy had entered the city, to break down the bridge, were closely pursued to the left bank of the Danube. In the battles of Eckmuhl and Ratisbon the French took upwards of twenty thousand prisoners, and the greater part of the Austrian artillery; so that in the short space of five days the Austrians had lost nearly forty thousand men and one hundred pieces of cannon.

When Charles had been defeated and compelled to retreat into that part of the Upper Palatinate which borders on Bohemia, Bonaparte, with the centre of his army, took that line of march which should at once enable him to pursue the archduke Louis, and to reach Vienna. A skirmish happened between the two armies, when the Austrians, to save themselves set fire to the town of Ebensberg; and Bonaparte, following the course of the Danube, advanced rapidly towards Vienna; having ordered the prince of Ponte Corvo with his army, who were principally Saxons, to follow the retreat of the archduke Charles as far as the town of Egra, in Bohemia. The corps of the archduke Louis, after they reached Saint Polten, divided; two-thirds of them crossed the Danube, the other third took the direction to Vienna.

On the 10th of May, Bonaparte appeared before Vienna, and immediately rendered himself master of the suburbs; but the city itself made an unexpected, though not a long, resistance. It was defended by about three thousand or four thousand regular troops, as many armed citizens, and a few battalions of landwehr, or country militia. Ordnance of different calibre was placed on the ramparts; and the numerous islands in the Danube, and low-lying bushy ground behind the town, were occupied by part of the corps of general Hiller, while the principal body of his forces was posted on the left shore of the river. The archduke Maximilian had the chief command in the city. For twenty-four hours the French howitzers played upon the town: but when the French had succeeded in crossing the smaller branches of the Danube, dislodged the troops from the islands nearest the city, and threatened to cut off all communication with the left bank, it was thought prudent to surrender.

Soon after Bonaparte obtained possession of the capital of the Austrian monarchy, he issued a proclamation addressed to the Hungarian nation, from Schœnbrunn, a favourite palace of the emperor Francis, where the headquarters of the French army were established. After the battle of Eckmuhl, the archduke Charles crossed the Danube, and retreated in the direction of Bohemia. The archduke, in order if possible to preserve Vienna, directed his march, after the unfortunate battle of Eckmuhl, by the route of Klentsch and Newarkt in Bohemia, under the expectation of being able to join the left wing of his army, under the command of general Hiller, at Lintz. The French army, however, by the rapidity of its movements, arrived at Lintz before him. At length the archduke, after various and fatiguing marches, pushed his advanced guards forwards near the Danube, and the cavalry was posted along the banks of a small rivulet, on ground covered, and partly concealed, by bushes.

Bonaparte resolved to cross the Danube and attack the archduke Charles in his position: for this purpose he marched his army along the south bank of the river till it had reached the distance of about six miles from Vienna. At this place he determined to effect his passage: the situation was extremely favourable. He accordingly crossed at In-der-Lobau, or the isle of Lobau, where bridges were thrown over with amazing rapidity. Bonaparte posted the right wing of his army on the village of Esling, and the left on that of Aspern. As soon as the archduke Charles was informed that the French had gained possession of the villages of Esling and Aspern, were rapidly accumulating in the town of Enzersdorf, and were advancing towards Heischstetten, he formed his plan of attack. As the recapture of Aspern was essentially necessary, in order to enable the Austrian artillery to play with effect upon the centre of the enemy's line, the first and second columns were ordered to attack this village. The conflict here was most obstinate and murderous: every street, every house, and every barn was the scene of it: scarcely had the Austrians succeeded in gaining possession of part of the village, when the French poured in strong reinforcements and regained it: at last, the second column, combining its movements and attacks with those of the first, made itself master of the upper part of the village, and maintained its position during the whole of the first day's combat.

The battle of the 21st was terminated only by the night: the French had been driven from Aspern: they still retained possession of Esling: but the morning of the 22d witnessed Aspern again in possession of the French: an Austrian regiment endeavoured to drive them out, but without effect; another rushed in, and, having gained possession of the churchyard, succeeded in maintaining themselves in the entrance to the village; being reinforced here under general Hiller, the Austrians at length obtained a final and unmolested possession of this long and dreadfully contested place. However, in the night between the 22d and 23d the enemy had effected his retreat from the south bank of the Danube, and taken up a position in the isle of Lobau. In this dreadful battle the Austrians took three pieces of cannon, and about eight thousand prisoners. The loss of the French in killed, wounded, and prisoners, could not be ascertained. Five of their generals were killed on the field of battle, eight were wounded, one of whom, the duke of Montebello, afterwards died; two were taken prisoners. The loss of the Austrians was also very great: they acknowledged the death of eighty-seven superior officers, and of upwards of four thousand subalterns and privates. Twelve of their generals, six hundred and sixty-three officers, and fifteen thousand six hundred and fifty-one subalterns and privates were wounded; of these, one general, eight officers, and eight hundred and twenty-nine men were taken prisoners by the French.

In Poland the Austrian army was for a time successful, and Warsaw was consequently occupied by the Austrians; but in the beginning of June, the grand duchy was abandoned by the Austrians, while the Russians and Polish army in the service of France occupied nearly the whole of Gallicia.

The king of Saxony having been compelled, like the rest of Bonaparte's vassal princes, to take up arms against Austria, soon found himself stripped, for a short time, of great part of his dominions, and compelled to abandon his capital. A formidable insurrection likewise sprung up in Saxony, Westphalia, and Hanover, which, after having harassed the French, was crushed by superior numbers and discipline. At the head of these insurgents were Schill and the duke of Brunswick Oels. After traversing the whole of the north of Germany in different directions, and perplexing or defeating the troops that were opposed to him, Schill was at length compelled to take refuge in Stralsund, with the hope of being able to effect his escape by sea. Stralsund, however, was forced; Schill's troops were driven from all their guns; and the enemy gained possession of streets filled with dead bodies of these insurgents. Schill and twenty of his officers were killed. Such of his officers as were taken prisoners were tried and executed, as being deserters from the service of the king of Prussia.

At the beginning of the campaign in Italy the Austrians were eminently successful; but on the anniversary of the battle of Marengo the two armies, for a third time, came to an engagement near Raab. Three thousand prisoners, six pieces of cannon, and four standards, were the immediate result of this victory. The archduke John retreated with rapidity, and in disorder, on the road to Pest. The city of Raab was thus left exposed; but it detained the French army eight days; when it capitulated.

From the day on which the battle of Aspern was fought till the end of the first week in July, Bonaparte continued stationary on the south bank of the Danube; but though stationary he was by no means inactive.

It is not easy to estimate exactly the number of the troops in either army. At a fair estimation, each may be reckoned at nearly one hundred and fifty thousand men. As the principal means of passing the Danube, Bonaparte made a feint of crossing opposite Esling; and as soon as he perceived the attention and the force of the Austrians principally drawn to that part, he began his measures for crossing the river on the left flank of the Austrian army, where it was in a great measure unprotected, and where if he succeeded in gaining a footing, they would be obliged to leave their entrenchments and fight him to great disadvantage. During the night of the 4th of July therefore new bridges were completed. One bridge of a single piece, eighty toises long, was fixed in less than five minutes; three others of boats and rafts were also thrown over the river. At two o'clock in the morning of the 5th, the whole French army had crossed the Danube, and at day-break they were arranged in order of battle, at the extremity of the left flank of the Austrians. The archduke Charles was thus most completely out-generalled: his works were rendered useless; he was compelled to abandon his positions, and to fight the French on the spot chosen by themselves and most convenient for them.

The whole of the 5th of July was spent in manœuvring; during the night of that day Bonaparte attempted to gain possession of the village of Wagram, but without success. On the morrow a general engagement was inevitable. The arrangements for this event were directly opposite on the part of Bonaparte and of the archduke Charles. The former strengthened his centre, where he was in person, and which was stationed within cannon shot of Wagram. The Austrian general, on the other hand, extended his flanks and weakened his centre. At day-break on the 6th the battle began. The archduke Charles soon after its commencement weakened his centre still further, and extended and strengthened his wings in such a manner as if he meant to outflank the French army. Bonaparte, perceiving this manœuvre, commanded a powerful and general attack to be made on the centre of the Austrian army: it gave way, and retreated nearly a league: the right wing, thus separated and left unsupported, fell rapidly back. At this moment it was briskly attacked in front by the duke of Rivoli; while the duke of Auerstadt attacked and outflanked the left wing, thrown into consternation and confusion by the retreat of the centre. The village of Wagram now fell into the hands of the French; and the Austrians, routed in all quarters, retreated towards Moravia. In this battle the French took ten pieces of cannon and twenty thousand prisoners, among whom were nearly four hundred officers. The French acknowledged that they had one thousand five hundred killed, and nearly four thousand wounded; but the loss on the part of the Austrians was much greater.

The French lost no time in pursuing the Austrians, and came up with them at Znaim. Here another battle took place, which, however, was soon terminated by a proposal from the emperor Francis to conclude an armistice. On the 12th of July this armistice was signed, the terms of which too plainly proved the extent of the loss the Austrians had sustained, and how completely destitute of hope and resources they were left. All the strong places and positions, which might be advantageous to the French in case the war was renewed, were delivered up; and by the fourth article it was expressly stipulated, that the Austrians were to abandon the inhabitants of the Tyrol and Voralberg.

From causes which have never been clearly and fully explained, the negociations for a definitive treaty of peace between France and Austria proceeded very slowly, and did not accomplish their object till the middle of October. When the terms of peace were made known, many people were disposed to regard them as by no means so unfavourable to Austria as had been generally anticipated (o).

The inhabitants of the Tyrol, though deserted and given up by that government in whose favour they had risen in arms, still refused submission to the Bavarians or French. At the head of the mountaineers appeared a man worthy of being a leader among a nation of heroes:—the brave Hoffer. Though the Tyrolese held out for some time, Bonaparte was determined on the conquest of their country, and at length he effected it by pouring in continued reinforcements, and by the capture and execution of the gallant Hoffer.

In France itself, our attention is called this year to a very important scene;—the divorce of Bonaparte from his empress Josephine. A rumour had for a long time gone abroad, which, though it occasionally died away, was always revived after a short interval, that Bonaparte meant to divorce Josephine, for the purpose of uniting himself with a younger and more noble bride. At last, on the 16th of December, his design to dissolve his marriage was formally announced. The project of a decree on the subject was submitted to the senate on that day, and before the sitting terminated the law authorizing the divorce was enacted. To witness this divorce, most of the relations of Bonaparte and Josephine were summoned to Paris. The arch-chancellor was ordered to attend in the grand cabinet of the emperor, where the empress, the kings of Holland, Westphalia, and Naples; the viceroy of Italy; the queens of Holland, Westphalia, and Spain; madame, the mother of Bonaparte, and the princess Pauline, were assembled.—The emperor then explained to them his views, and the motives which had led him to form them and carry them into execution. Anxious to promote the interests of France, and convinced that those interests would be best secured if he should leave children to inherit his throne, brought up in the knowledge of his plans, and imbibing from him his love of the French people, he had come to the reluctant determination to divorce the empress Josephine, by whom he could no longer expect to have issue, in order that he might unite himself to a more youthful bride. This motive alone, and not any ground of complaint against the empress, whom he wished still to retain the title, and whom he should always esteem, had led him to this step. As soon as Bonaparte had finished, the empress stepped forward, and declared that she willingly consented to the divorce, in order to forward the emperor's generous and patriotic views. From him she had received all she possessed: towards him she felt the strongest attachment; of this attachment she gave the greatest proof by consenting to cease to be his wife.—A procès verbal was then drawn up, which was signed by the kings, queens, princes, and princesses present, as well as by the emperor and empress (p).

On the 23rd of January, 1810, the fourth session of the fourth

(o) The cessions which Austria made may be considered under three heads:—first, those to the sovereigns forming the Rhenish league generally; secondly, those to Bonaparte; and thirdly, those to the king of Saxony. To the king of Bavaria, as one of the sovereigns of the Rhenish league, Austria ceded Salzburg, and a portion of territory extending along the banks of the Danube, from Passau to the vicinity of Lintz. To France she gave up Fiume and Trieste, and the whole of the country to the south of the Save, till that river enters Bosnia. The king of Saxony obtained a few villages in Bohemia; and in Poland, the whole of Western Gallicia, from the frontiers of Silesia to the Bog, together with the city of Cracow, and a district round it in Eastern Gallicia. Russia obtained so much of the territory of this latter province, as should contain four hundred thousand souls. With respect to external politics, the emperor Francis agreed to acknowledge Joseph Bonaparte king of Spain. But the most mortifying and humiliating condition is that by which the Austrian monarch gave up the inhabitants of the Tyrol, with a provision, indeed, that Bonaparte shall procure for them a complete and full pardon.

(p) We insert the following, because it establishes the right of Dissenters in a case which some of the established clergy had thought fit to dispute: on the 11th of December, a cause concerning the burial of a child, was heard in the Court of Arches, Doctors' Commons, in which the rev. Mr. Kempe was plaintiff, and the rev. Mr. Wicks defendant. Mr. Kempe is a minister of the Calvinistic Independent persuasion, and Mr.

fourth parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, was opened by commission. The speech which was read by the lord chancellor, adverted to the affairs of the continent, the expedition to the Scheldt, and to the state of affairs with respect to America.

On the motion for an address to his majesty, as usual on the opening of the session, the earl of St. Vincent said, he had intended never to open his lips again in that house; but he could not sit silent after the disasters and failures which had recently overwhelmed the country; disasters and failures which were solely attributable to the ignorance and incapacity of ministers. Of those ministers, who, on a former occasion, fired guns, rang bells, and trumpeted forth shouts of joy, as if for a great triumph, when that triumph turned out to be the disastrous convention of Cintra; and who now, in his majesty's speech, had converted a disaster into another triumph, talking of the glorious victory of Talavera, a victory which to us had all the consequences of defeat; the enemy taking prisoners, whilst we took none; taking also our hospital with our sick and wounded, and our own troops finally obliged to retreat. He did not mean to condemn the conduct of the officers employed in Spain or in Walcheren; he believed that they did their duty; the disasters and failures in both instances were to be attributed to ministers. In the case of Walcheren, the expedition was ill planned, ill advised, and the object of it impracticable.

On the 28th, the earl of Liverpool moved the thanks of the house of lords to lord Wellington, and the army under his command, for the bravery and valour by which they obtained the victory at Talavera; which was carried.

The 29th, Mr. Perceval moved in the house of commons a vote of thanks to lord Gambier; which, after a considerable debate, was carried, but not unanimously.

On the 31st, Mr. Banks made a motion on the subject of reversionary grants, and concluded by moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill, to render perpetual the act for preventing the grant of offices in reversion." The motion was carried unanimously.

The 19th of February, on the motion of Mr. Yorke, the printer of a hand-bill for the Westminster Forum (Debating Society), was ordered to attend at the bar, to answer for a breach of privilege, in announcing the following comparative question: "Which is the most deserving the censure of the public—Mr. Yorke's enforcement of the standing order of the house to exclude strangers from the enquiry into the Walcheren expedition, or Mr. Windham's late attack on the liberty of the press?" The next day, J. Dean being called to the bar, acknowledged himself the printer, and Mr. John Gale Jones, the author of the Westminster Forum hand-bill, when the latter was ordered into the custody of the serjeant at arms.

On the 21st, Mr. Yorke moved the order of the day, and Mr. John Gale Jones was called in; and being addressed by the speaker, and shewn the libel complained of, was asked what he had to say in his behalf. Mr. Jones readily acknowledged himself to be the author of the paper in question, expressed regret that the printer should have felt any inconvenience upon his account, declared that he had no intention of making any innovations upon the rights and privileges of that assembly, apologized for having inadvertently given cause of offence, and threw himself upon the compassionate indulgence of that house. He then retired. Mr. Yorke, after declaring that he was not actuated by any personal motives, which was warmly cheered from all parts of the house, moved that J. G. Jones be committed to Newgate. A petition from Mr. Dean having been subsequently presented, acknowledging his offence, and praying the clemency of the house, he was brought to the bar, reprimanded, and discharged without paying any fees.

On the 12th of March, sir Francis Burdett, in a lengthened speech, made a motion respecting the committal of John Gale Jones. The tendency of the honourable baronet's arguments went to prove, that, though the house had the power of committing its own members, it had not the like power over others; that this assumption of authority was of very recent date; that it trenched upon the liberty of the subject as provided for by Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, inasmuch as the house took upon itself to be the complainant, judge, jury, and executive authority, all united in one; and that, contrary to the custom of all other tribunals, it took two steps at once, and jumped directly upon its alarming conclusion, in finding the accused guilty. He concluded by moving the discharge of Mr. John Gale Jones.

Mr. Sheridan differed from the honourable mover, as to the privileges possessed by that house; but regretted that Mr. Jones should be made the unavailing martyr to doctrines which he never propagated, nor perhaps ever entertained; for he had never said with the honourable baronet, that the house had no jurisdiction over any except its own members. He concluded by moving as an amendment, "That Mr. J. G. Jones, having been now imprisoned since the 21st of February, and having expressed his contrition at the time for the offence, be now discharged."

The chancellor of the exchequer opposed the original motion, because he was certain, that the house had the power to punish all offences which tended to bring it into contempt; and he should oppose the amendment, because there was no instance of an individual having been discharged out of custody unless he condescended in person to petition.

Some farther discussion ensued, after which the amendment was negatived without a division; and the house having divided upon the original motion, there appeared for it fourteen, against it one hundred and thirty-nine.

On the 27th, Mr. Lethbridge laid on the table a paper which sir Francis Burdett had admitted to have been written and published by his authority; stating, that he had marked the passages which justified the charge he had preferred. The clerk, being directed by the speaker, read the whole of sir F. Burdett's letter, together with the report of his speech respecting the case of Mr. J. Gale Jones, as published in Cobbett's Register. The speaker then called upon the honourable baronet to answer the complaint alledged against him.

Sir Francis declared, that he was perfectly willing to leave the matter to the consideration of the house, and to abide the consequences of his conduct. He had nothing to urge, he said, in the shape of defence, for he knew not in what he had offended. Until that moment the honourable gentleman (Mr. Lethbridge) had not furnished the house with any explanation of the ground of his complaint—of what he even deemed offensive; and he had not yet explained why he considered the passages alluded to involved a breach of the privileges of the house. He had no intention of violating their privileges; and as to the doctrines contained in the publication referred to, he conceived those doctrines to be perfectly constitutional. He had stated the reasons why he thought so; and, until those reasons were answered, he should think it unnecessary to offer any thing more. The honourable baronet, upon an intimation from the speaker, then withdrew, amidst loud cries from many of the members of No! no!

Mr. Lethbridge then read his resolutions:—the first was, that the publication which had been read to the house from Cobbett's Register of the 24th instant, was a libellous and scandalous paper, reflecting upon the just rights and privileges of that house; the second resolution was, that sir Francis Burdett, having admitted that he was the author of the paper alluded to, was guilty of a gross breach of the privileges of that house. Upon the first resolution being again read, Mr. Ponsonby moved that the debate be adjourned till this day se'nnight; to which Mr. Perceval proposed as an amendment, that the debate be adjourned till to-morrow; which was carried by a majority of fifty. This, however, was afterwards rescinded, and the original motion was adopted.

On the 5th of April, the adjourned debate on Mr. Lethbridge's motion was resumed, when the resolution originally proposed by that gentleman, deeming sir F. Bur-

Mr. Wicks a rector of a parish in Somersetshire. The latter had refused to bury the corpse of a child belonging to two parishioners, on the ground of its having been baptized by a dissenting minister. It was contended, on the part of the rev. Mr. Wicks, that the administering of this sacrament must be performed by a lawful minister of the established church of England, otherwise such baptism was to be considered null and void, both by the ancient and modern rubrics, canon law, and various other authorities, quoted by the learned civilians on the subject. Sir John Nicholl, after hearing the counsel on behalf of the promoter of the suit, was of opinion (after entering at considerable length into the various authorities upon the point in question,) that the rev. Mr. Wicks had mistaken the law, and that it was his duty to have performed the ceremony; at the same time recommending, as this suit was not brought by Mr. Kempe through any vindictive spirit, but only for the purpose of determining the right, and setting the question at rest, that he would be satisfied with correcting the error, and establishing the right, without proceeding any further in the cause.

dett's

dett's letter to his constituents a libel, &c. was read. A debate of an immoderate length took place, which our limits will not permit us to insert, since it continued till seven o'clock in the morning of the next day, when, upon the motion of sir R. Salusbury, that sir F. Burdett be committed to the Tower, strangers were excluded from the gallery. To this motion, an amendment was proposed by Mr. Adam, that the honourable baronet should be reprimanded in his place. The house then divided, when the numbers were,—for the amendment one hundred and fifty-two; for the original motion one hundred and eighty nine. Majority for sir F. Burdett's committal thirty-seven (q).

Long and vehement debates took place at different times on the subject of sir F. Burdett's committal, and his conduct previous to his apprehension; and on the 13th, the speaker stated, that he had received a notice, dated the 9th instant, from Mr. Ellis, sir F. Burdett's attorney, of the baronet's intention to bring his action of trespass against Charles Abbot, Esq. for having ordered an unlawful and forcible entry into his house, and illegally imprisoning him in a certain prison called the Tower. The letter was ordered to be entered on the Journals.

Lord Cochrane, on the 17th, presented the petition and remonstrance of the electors of Westminster, in which they said, "We are convinced, that no one ought to be the prosecutor, juror, judge, or executioner, in his own cause; much less to assume, accumulate, and exercise all those offices in his own person." The petition concluded with, "We, therefore, most earnestly call upon your honourable house, to restore to us our representative, and, according to the notice he has given, to take the state of the representation of the people into your consideration; a reform in which is, in our opinion, the only means of preserving the country from military despotism." His lordship then moved, that it be laid upon the table.

In the mean time, vehement debates took place on the subject of the fatal expedition to Walcheren, in which we lost so many thousands of brave men, expended an immense quantity of treasure, and effected—nothing.

The chancellor of the exchequer, on the 30th of April, brought down a message from his majesty, stating, that in consequence of the occupation of the territories of the duke of Brunswick by the French armies, since 1806, his serene highness the present duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttle, his majesty's nephew, has been compelled to seek an asylum in his majesty's dominions. His majesty therefore recommends it to this house, to consider of the means of enabling him to make such provision for the establishment of his serene highness, as may be suitable to the rank and misfortunes of a prince so nearly allied to his majesty's throne, and for whom his majesty's feelings are so strongly interested.

Accordingly, on the 4th of May, the house having gone into a committee on the king's message, the chancellor of the exchequer proposed a vote of seven thousand pounds a year to the duke of Brunswick, payable out of the consolidated fund; which, after a few observations, was agreed to.

Since the committal of Mr. J. G. Jones to Newgate, and sir F. Burdett to the Tower, petitions were sent to the house of commons, from various counties and towns in different parts of the kingdom, praying the release of those gentlemen; some of them were ordered to lie on the table, but others of them were rejected.

On the 21st of June, the commissioners, consisting of the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, &c. having taken their seats in the house of lords, the speaker, attended by several members of the house of commons, appeared at the bar, when the lord chancellor, in the name of his majesty, delivered a speech, in which he said, "His majesty has commanded us to acquaint you, that, as the public business is now concluded, he thinks it proper to put an end to the present session of parliament."

We shall now advert to the affairs of the continent. The kingdom of Holland was pitched upon as necessary to be added to the French empire; for, the Exposé expressly says, "Holland is, in fact, only a part of France. A definition of that country may be given, by saying, that it is a continuation of the Rhine, the Meuse, and the Scheldt—that is to say, of the great arteries of the French empire."

On the 27th of February, the senate met at Paris, when the prince arch-chancellor, who presided on the occasion, read the following message from the emperor:—"Senators, We have dispatched to Vienna, as our ambassador extraordinary, our cousin the prince of Neufchatel, to solicit the hand of the arch-duchess Maria Louisa, daughter of the emperor of Austria. We have given orders to our minister of foreign relations to lay before you the articles of the treaty of marriage between us and the arch-duchess Maria Louisa, which has been concluded, signed, and ratified. We have been desirous of eminently contributing to the happiness of the present generation. The enemies of the continent have founded their prosperity upon its dissensions and divisions. They can no longer nourish war, by imputing to us projects incompatible with the ties and duties of affinity, which we have just contracted with the imperial house reigning in Austria. The brilliant qualities which distinguish the arch-duchess Maria Louisa, have acquired her the love of the people of Austria. They have fixed our regards. Our people will love this princess from their love for us, until, being witnesses of all the virtues which have given her so high a place in our thoughts, they shall love her for herself.—Given at our palace of the Thuilleries, the 27th of February, 1810.

(Signed) "NAPOLEON."

After the message was read, the duke de Cadore communicated to the senate the articles of the marriage treaty, which are in the usual form. It is reported, that the articles of the treaty are, with regard to portion, dowry, and jewels, in all respects the same as those in the marriage treaties in preceding reigns between the kings and dauphins of France, and the princesses of Austria. The value of the jewels and the nuptial ornaments which Napoleon had destined for his bride, is estimated at eighteen millions of francs.

The marriage was celebrated at Vienna, on the 11th of March, at six in the evening, and the empress set off on the 13th on her way to Paris, where the ceremony took place on the 1st of April. The train of the empress Louisa was supported by four queens, and after the marriage the royal pair set off for St. Cloud. Three days after they received the congratulations of the senate. Bonaparte's answer was short and general; and the empress contrary to the practice of her predecessors, made no reply.

(q) Thus the house of commons, at seven o'clock in the morning of the 6th of April, adjudged that sir Francis Burdett, bart. who had admitted that a letter signed Francis Burdett, and a further part of a paper, intituled, 'Argument,' in Cobbet's Weekly Register, of March 24, 1810, was printed by his authority (which letter and argument the house had resolved to be a libellous and scandalous paper, reflecting on the just rights and privileges of the house), had been thereby guilty of a breach of the privileges of the house; and thereupon ordered that he be for his said offence committed to his majesty's Tower of London. Mr. John Burdett, brother to sir Francis (who had remained in the vicinity of the house throughout the night) proceeded to Wimbledon to apprize his brother of the result of the debate. Sir Francis arrived in town about one o'clock, when he received a note from the serjeant at arms, informing him of the order of the house, and requesting to know when he should wait upon him with the speaker's warrant, for the purpose of accompanying him to the Tower. Sir Francis, however, had not been many minutes at his house, when Mr. Colman entered; and he was informed, that the honourable baronet would be at leisure to speak with him at twelve o'clock on Saturday. Upon this Mr. Colman departed; but about six o'clock in the evening, he again called, and stating to sir Francis that he had the speaker's order to execute the warrant forthwith, the baronet replied that he would not go with him. Mr. Colman urged the authority of his warrant, and that he was entitled, if he thought proper, to call in aid for its enforcement. Sir Francis denied the authority of such an instrument, alleging his right to call in aid, if he thought proper, to resist its execution, and expressed his resolution to repel force by force. Sir Francis then wrote a letter to the speaker, assigning his reasons for refusing to submit to his warrant; and the serjeant and messengers, not thinking it prudent to resort to force, went away; and the baronet remained at home during the rest of the day; in the course of which he was visited by Mr. Whitbread, colonel Wardle, lord Folkstone, the earl of Thanet, and other gentlemen. A great number of persons assembled during the day in front of sir Francis's house in Piccadilly, shouting "Burdett for ever!" The people began to get disorderly, and attacked the houses of several persons whom they conceived inimical to the principles of sir Francis; the riot act was read; and the military were called out. At length, on Monday the 9th, the officers entered the house by forcing the kitchen window, in front; and sir Francis was taken and conveyed to the Tower in a glass coach, accompanied by his brother, the serjeant at arms, and Mr. Wright, under a strong guard, both civil and military. He arrived at the Tower about twelve o'clock. Upon the return of the troops from the Tower, the mud and stones from the populace began to play on them in showers.—Opposite the Trinity House they could endure the assault no longer, but charged the multitude sword in hand. The firing of the carbines became now pretty general. The contest continued all the way up Fenchurch Street, where a shot entering the shop of Mr. Goodeve, wounded Mr. Ebral, a corn-meter, who since died. Coroners' inquests sat on him and on the body of James Pledge, another person who had been shot in Piccadilly: they then returned verdicts of Wilful Murder against Life Guardsmen unknown. Another inquest sat on Thomas Bryant, who was said to have been active in attacking the troops. A verdict of Justifiable Homicide was returned. No other lives, it is believed, were lost, though many persons were wounded.

By

By this marriage, the emperor Napoleon is related to almost all the royal families in Europe. Besides being son-in-law to the emperor of Austria, and nephew to the archduke Charles, he is great nephew to the queen of Naples, first cousin to Ferdinand the Seventh, and to the prince regent of Portugal; he is also nephew to the daughter of Louis the Sixteenth, the duchess of Angoulême.

By a decree of the senate, which adopted a senatus consultum at Paris, Rome was united to the French empire.

In Spain the French made great progress. It appears, that the line of defence formed by the Spaniards on the Sierra Morena, was suddenly forced by the French, who by their manœuvres completely deceived the Spaniards, and even in some instances debouched in the rear of their mines and entrenchments, by which their progress was expected to have been opposed. In these operations the French are stated to have taken six thousand prisoners, including two generals, twenty-five pieces of cannon, eight standards, and several magazines, and to have effected the total dispersion of the remains of the Spanish army which had rallied after the defeat of Ocana. The letter containing this intelligence was dated the 22nd of January, from Baylen. On the 29th, the French were within two leagues of Seville, whence the people were flying in all directions. Cadiz was crowded with refugees. On the 31st, eleven thousand men of the duke of Albuquerque's army entered the isle of Leon. A strong detachment of the French cavalry attempted to surprize Alcala la Real, to which place the Spanish park of artillery had been removed; but it failed. In consequence of the advanced position of the enemy, the Spanish fleet at Cadiz was moved to the outer harbour, and anchored on the outside of the English squadron.

The people of Cadiz became greatly enraged at the members of the late junta, some of whom had been publicly denounced as traitors. Several of them who had arrived were personally assailed by the populace, and had nearly fallen victims to the infuriated resentment of the people. General Venegas was also suspected of treason; and though he had publicly appealed for protection, it was with the utmost difficulty he escaped with his life.

Marshal Augereau sent to the minister of war an account of a battle fought in the plains of Vech, between the division of general Souham and the Spanish army of Catalonia, commanded by general O'Donnell; in which the latter were defeated with the loss of six thousand three hundred men, and retreated to Tarragona. The Spaniards were the assailants, and it is admitted that the attack was made with great fury. General Souham was wounded.

The French general Bonnet, in his report from Oviedo, declares, that the patriots were in such superior force, that they meditated an attack upon him; which he anticipated, by attacking them on the 14th: that the battle was renewed on the 15th, and that it ended in the defeat of the Spaniards, who were driven to the frontiers of Gallicia.

The whole of the Spanish men of war at Carthagena, consisting of the San Carlos and San Fernando, of one hundred and thirty guns; the Guerrero and San Pueblo, seventy-fours, and the Soledad frigate, were, through the exertions of colonel Roche and sir S. Hood, removed to Gibraltar and Mahon.

The French opened a new work in the neighbourhood of Matagorda, without producing the effect apprehended upon Cadiz. The distance across the channel of the Puntals is only one thousand three hundred and thirty yards; but the nearest French battery to the front bastion of Cadiz, was three thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight yards removed from it, and the two next batteries were four thousand one hundred and eighteen, and five thousand two hundred and three yards distant.

Joseph Bonaparte had a very narrow escape in his journey from Grenada to Madrid. A number of armed peasants in order to intercept him, concealed themselves in one of the sinuosities of the Sierra Morena: on a sudden they made their appearance, and discharged several rounds. Some of the balls pierced the carriage, and killed two of his attendants; but he escaped.

Marshal Augereau was recalled from the command of the army in Catalonia, and succeeded by Macdonald; and Barcelona was supplied with provisions, during the absence of the British squadron in a gale of wind.

Two prison-ships were driven on shore on that side of the bay of Cadiz occupied by the French. The prisoners on board one of them, amounting to several hundreds, escaped on shore. The other prison-ship being in imminent danger, as a heavy sea was breaking over her, assistance was sent to her from the British squadron. Instead, however, of gratefully acknowledging and accepting these offices of humanity, the Frenchmen, who had by this time obtained complete possession of the vessel, fired upon the English boats, killed nineteen of the crews, and wounded several. A heavy fire was, in consequence, opened on the prison-ship, by which nearly two hundred of the refractory were killed and wounded. A Spanish ship of the line, with a considerable quantity of dollars on board, also ran ashore about the same time; the disaster was ascribed rather to treachery than accident or negligence. The vessel was, however, fortunately got off by the exertions of the British seamen.

The British force in Cadiz at the beginning of June, amounted to seven thousand men, the Portuguese to fifteen hundred, and the Spaniards to fifteen thousand, making in the whole twenty-three thousand five hundred.

By a decree dated Fontainbleau, October 19, 1810, all prohibited articles of English manufacture at that time in France, or that might after that period be brought into it, were ordered to be burned. A similar order was applied to Holland, the duchy of Berg, the Hanse Towns, and all the country between the Maine and the sea. By this decree, all British merchandize introduced into the kingdoms of Italy or Naples, the Illyrian provinces, the parts of Spain occupied by the French, and generally in all the places within the reach of the French troops was to be burned also. It likewise ordered that those who introduced them should be branded on the forehead, and imprisoned from three to ten years.

By a decree of the 12th of November, Napoleon united to the French empire the territory of the Valais, under the name of the Department of Simplon. The pretexts for this annexation were, that the Simplon, connecting France and Italy, had cost both treasuries eighteen millions of livres; that the Valais had not adhered to its engagements, and that it was necessary to put an end to the struggles for power among the population.

A convention was concluded between France and Austria; by the articles of which, the sequestrations upon the property of the partizans of either in the Austrian territories, or in those of the Rhenish Confederation, were done away, in order, as the preamble states, to efface all traces of the late war in Germany. In conformity with this arrangement, all the Austrian nobles having possessions in the states of the Rhenish Confederation, were requested to declare, within the first days of the year 1811, whether they would choose to remain in the service of the court of Vienna, or return to their possessions within the limits of the Confederation. In the first case they were required to sell such estates within the space of five years, or transfer them to some branch of their family who would be resident.

The Austrian monarchy, by the loss of the quicksilver mines of Istria, in consequence of the late war, and the lead mines of Bleyberg, the customs at Trieste, the salt works at Hallein, Saltzburgh, and Wicheza in Gallicia, with the customs of the ceded countries, sustained an annual deficiency in her revenues of forty millions of francs. It may likewise be added, that the sum total of the war contributions paid by Austria to France, amounted to eighty-five millions of francs, of which thirty millions were paid in cash, and the rest in bills of exchange, at five millions per month; the last payment of which was to take place in October, 1810.

The annexation of the Hanoverian territory to the kingdom of Westphalia, was definitively settled. A proclamation issued by king Jerome to his new subjects, was dated from Cassel, the 1st of March; and after stating that Napoleon had, by a convention concluded at Paris on the 14th of January, resigned all his rights and claims on that country to him, congratulates the Hanoverians on being relieved from the painful state of uncertainty in which they had hitherto lingered, adverts to their present misery and wretchedness—engages to protect them from all attacks of continental powers, and to secure them from the insults incident to a maritime war; and concludes with expressing a hope, that they will render themselves worthy of the brilliant prospect which this union opens to their view. The deputies of Hanover took the oath of allegiance to their new sovereign, on the part of the people, at Cassel, on the 14th of March. Hanover is to be divided into three departments, viz. those of the Aller, of the Ilmenau, and of the Mouths of the Elbe and Weser (r).

In the Tyrol disturbances broke out in consequence of an attempt to enforce the conscription system among those brave people. A number of the inhabitants, to avoid this hateful measure, fled to the mountains, and relying upon their fastnesses, braved the military. Occasionally, they descended into the valleys, and interrupted by their incursions, the communication between the different districts. The presence of a large military therefore became necessary, to prevent the insurrection extending to the Pusterthal, the inhabitants of which were adverse to their country being incorporated with the Illyrian provinces.

In Spain the supreme junta issued an edict, ordaining that the armies should be augmented to one hundred thousand men; and that one hundred thousand lances, and one hundred thousand poignards should be manufactured and distributed among the provinces where they might be of use. The war in the Peninsula therefore assumed an unlooked for and flattering degree of promise.

The Spanish general Ballasteros, it appears by a dispatch from marquis Romana, had his head quarters on the 28th of March, in the neighbourhood of Ronquillo, from whence he reports that he had defeated the enemy at Santa Olalla, and dislodged them from all the strong posts in the neighbourhood. These positions are to the westward of the Sierra Morena, direct north of Seville, and nearly in the rear of the French troops in Andalusia.

The duke of Treviso for four successive days attacked Badajoz, but was repulsed with loss, and fell back towards Merida.

A plan was entered into at St. Andero, to expel the French from that town and neighbourhood, by a general rising of the inhabitants. The plot was partially executed on the 3rd of April, and about one hundred of the enemy killed in their quarters. The garrison, however, recovering from the alarm, attacked, and ultimately overpowered the inhabitants, vast numbers of whom were put to the sword, and about two hundred sent off under an escort to France.

By the dispatches which were received from sir John Stuart, dated Messina, April 24, it appears that the Greek island of St. Maura was captured by the British troops under brigadier-general Oswald, aided by a naval force under captain Eyre, of the Magnificent, after several smart and well contested actions with the French garrison, which amounted to sixteen hundred men, and the remains of which finally surrendered prisoners of war.

The French were successful in taking Ciudad Rodrigo, which, after a most obstinate defence, during a terrific and destructive fire of sixteen days, surrendered at discretion, as appears from the account given by his highness the Marshal Prince of Essling, in a report dated the 12th of July. The report says, "it is impossible to form an idea of the state to which Ciudad Rodrigo is reduced. Every thing is battered down and ruined, not so much as a single house standing entire." Upwards of two thousand men were killed, including the troops and inhabitants. The garrison, consisting of seven thousand men, laid down their arms in the arsenal on the entrance of the French troops. At this place the French took six stand of colours, one hundred and twenty-five excellent pieces of artillery, the greater part of them brass, two hundred thousand pounds of powder, twelve hundred thousand cartridges, and a considerable quantity of shot and artillery stores.

On the 29th of July, the French general count Serras attacked the fort of Senabria, which was defended by three thousand Spaniards. This post is important says the French account, because it commands the entrance into Portugal, and shuts up the communications with Gallicia. After a slight resistance the Spanish general abandoned the town, and the French found therein twenty pieces of artillery, and provisions for three thousand men for six months.

On the 15th of August, the prince of Essling caused the trenches to be opened before Almeida, when a false attack, directed against the north of the town, had drawn the attention of the besieged to that quarter. After a most obstinate defence, which continued till the 26th, the governor sent some officers to request a cessation of hostilities. Marshal Massena, prince of Essling, made known to them the terms of capitulation which he intended to offer, and several hours were employed in negociation; but as this did not answer the expectations of the French general, he ordered the fire to re-commence at eight in the evening, and three hours after the governor signed a capitulation, by which the garrison surrendered prisoners of war, and the Portuguese militia deposited their arms, and were permitted to return home. The French found on the batteries ninety-eight pieces of cannon, and seventeen requiring repair, three thousand rations of biscuit, one hundred thousand rations of salt meat, and a great quantity of other provisions.

On the 27th of September a battle was fought between the armies under marshal Massena (prince of Essling) and lord viscount Wellington in the position of Busaco in Portugal. This was a well contested action, which fortunately turned much to the advantage of the English forces under the command of his lordship: the French, it is said, left two thousand dead on the field of battle, and that the number of their wounded was immense. The English and Portuguese, according to the dispatch, had about two hundred and ten killed, and about nine hundred and fifty wounded.

In the East our arms were attended with success in the capture of Amboyna, one of the Molucca islands, by a squadron of British ships under captains Tucker, Montague, and Spencer, who, with one hundred and seventy-six troops and the seamen and marines of the Dover, Cornwallis, and Samarang, the whole force amounting only to four hundred and one men, including officers, proceeded up the harbour on the 9th of February, and made good their landing on the 15th, under the command of captain Court, of the India Company's coast artillery. The ships commenced the attack by cannonading the fort and surrounding batteries, which was continued for two hours and a half, though exposed to a heavy fire of red hot shot from the heights on the left of the town. In the mean time, the force on shore had stormed the battery of Wannatoo, notwithstanding the determined opposition of the enemy, who had two officers killed, and one dangerously wounded, and the guns were turned upon the enemy in their retreat. Captain Court then proceeded in the arduous undertaking along the heights to turn the enemy's position at Batter Gantong, which commanded the town of Amboyna. After a fatiguing march, ascending and descending hills over which there was no road, and many of them so extremely steep as to require the assistance of the busher for the men to get up and down by, they reached an eminence which effectually commanded the enemy, who retired immediately, and the battery was entered without opposition. In this state of things, a summons was sent to the governor on the morning of the 17th, and a capitulation was agreed to, by which the island was given up to the British on the 19th; the garrison to be sent to Java at the expence of the captors. The island was defended by one hundred and thirty Europeans and upwards of one thousand Javanese and Mandurese troops, exclusive of the crews of three vessels sunk in the inner harbour, amounting to two hundred and twenty men, aided by the Dutch inhabitants. The loss sustained by the British at Amboyna, and at the destruction of a Dutch fort at Poolo Combu, in the Celebes, was only five killed and nineteen wounded.

The English took seven vessels of war of various descriptions, forty-two government supply vessels of different descriptions, and three neutrals; in all fifty-two.—By another letter from captain Tucker, dated from Amboyna, March 1, it appears, that the valuable islands from Saparona, Harouka, and Nassau-Laut, as well as those of Bouro and Manippa, likewise surrendered to his majesty's forces.

His majesty's arms were also crowned with success in another expedition in the Indian seas, by which the island of Bonaparte (late Bourbon) was added to his dominions. The expedition consisted of the Boadicea, Neriade, Sirius, and Iphigenia, under the command of commodore Rowley, and a force of three thousand six hundred and fifty European and Indian troops, under lieutenant-colonel Keating. On the 7th of July, a partial landing was effected on the island, but, owing to the violence of the surf, the remainder of the force was not put on shore till the next day, when colonel Keating advanced to the attack of the capital (St. Denis). Every thing was in readiness, and the grand attack would have taken place in less than half an hour, when a suspension of arms was demanded by "a brave, though vanquished enemy," and thus, says the

(r) We may here remark, that the total loss of the empire of Austria, from 1804 to the peace of Vienna in 1809, amounts to three thousand one hundred and eighty-eight square leagues, and five millions nine hundred and seventy-eight thousand five hundred and thirty-six inhabitants.

colonel,

colonel, "in a few hours has this rich, extensive, and valuable colony, been added to his gracious majesty's dominions, with a population of upwards of one hundred thousand souls, and with a loss on our part comparatively trifling." By the capitulation, the French troops (fifteen hundred) were allowed the honours of war; they were to be sent to the Cape of Good Hope; and the laws, customs, and religion of the inhabitants, as well as their private property, was to be insured to them. The loss of the British consisted of eighteen men killed, and seventy-nine wounded.

The parliament met, pursuant to adjournment, on the 1st of November; when the lord Chancellor in a very impressive manner observed, that their lordships were met together pursuant to regular notification for the first of November, which stated, that his majesty would appoint a commission in the usual manner. But it was with the deepest concern and regret that he found himself under the necessity of informing their lordships, that such was at prerent the state of the personal indisposition of his majesty, that he had not thought it his duty under the circumstances to proffer to his sovereign a commission to receive a sign manual. This personal indisposition of his majesty was created by the pressure of that domestic affliction (in which every noble lord must sympathize) upon his majesty's paternal feelings (s). But he was happy to say, that there were strong hopes of his majesty's recovery from that indisposition. His lordship then stated, that he had not felt himself authorized to put the great seal to the commission without the sign manual, and must therefore leave it to their wisdom to adopt such measures as the importance of the occasion required.

The earl of Liverpool, after dwelling briefly on the lamented situation of the health of his majesty, caused, as it had been truly stated by the noble lord on the woolsack, by a serious and severe domestic calamity, stated, that there was every reason to hope, from the opinions of the physicians who attended the royal person, for a speedy recovery from the illness under which his majesty at present suffered. Upon a view of the circumstances, his lordship felt it to be his duty, and he believed he felt it in common with the house, to move that their lordships do adjourn for a fortnight.

Lord Holland would have preferred an adjournment de die in diem; but, the present motion being founded on a parliamentary precedent, he would not oppose it. Carried nem. dis.

In the commons, the same day, the speaker having stated the circumstances under which they met, and that notwithstanding the royal proclamation for the further prorogation of parliament, they were not to expect any message from the commissioners, declared that he felt it his duty to take the chair, in order that the house might adjourn itself; which was accordingly agreed to.

On the 15th of November, the parliament again assembled, when the lord chancellor stated, in the house of lords, that he had written letters to all the lords who were members, desiring their attendance that day; and that some few, whose names he read, had excused themselves on various grounds. The house having filled, his lordship advanced to the table, and, after premising as his reason for addressing them from that place instead of the woolsack, that he intended to conclude with a motion, entered into a statement similar to that made on the 1st instant, as to the cause of his majesty's illness. He then stated, that the physicians had confident hope of his majesty's recovery, and did not conceive, that there was any necessity for adopting any proceeding to supply the defect of the royal authority, he should conclude by moving an adjournment till this day fortnight; which was carried without a dissenting voice.

In the commons, the same day, the speaker took the chair; and after similar observations to those made in the house of lords, the house adjourned for a fortnight.

On the 29th of November, in the house of lords, earl Camden presented the report of the privy council, containing the examination of the physicians, Drs. Reynolds, Heberden, Willis, and sir H. Halford; who all stated that his majesty was incapable of business; but that they entertained the most confident hopes of his recovery, though they could not state at what period he might become convalescent.

The earl of Liverpool, after a short speech, moved, that the house do adjourn till Thursday, the 13th of December; which, after some debate, was carried.

In the commons, the same day, Mr. secretary Ryder presented the report of the physicians, as taken before the privy council; when the question being put, it was ordered to be laid on the table.—The report having been read, the chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the house do adjourn, at its rising, for fourteen days; which was agreed to.

On the 13th of December, the parliament met again, when, in the house of lords, the earl of Liverpool stated, that, unfortunately, there was not that advance in his majesty's recovery which could warrant him in proposing another adjournment. He therefore moved, "That a select committee be appointed to examine the physicians who have attended his majesty during his illness, respecting the state of his majesty's health, and to report such examination to the house." The motion was carried unanimously; and the committee to consist of twenty-one lords.

In the commons, the same day, the chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the appointment of a select committee, of twenty-one members, to examine the physicians; and that the house should adjourn to the 17th, when it would receive the report. The motion was unanimously agreed to.

On December 17, Mr. Dundas brought up the report of the committee appointed to examine his majesty's physicians.

The chancellor of the Exchequer moved, "That the house should be called over on the 20th, and that it should form itself into a committee on the state of the nation."

Mr. Ponsonby declared, that he should strenuously oppose the proceeding by way of bill, as tending to degrade the kingly office.

Mr. Sheridan, after warm encomiums on the letter written by the prince of Wales in 1788, recommended the precedent of the Irish parliament, which voted an address to the heir apparent, praying that he would be pleased to take upon him the regency, &c. with such limitations as parliament might deem proper.

In the house of lords on the 19th, lord Grenville said, that with respect to the course to be pursued, it was with pain he found himself unable to concur with those noble friends with whom he generally acted. After a lapse of twenty years, and giving the question the most attentive consideration, it was the honest conviction of his mind, that the defect of the royal authority could be supplied only by legislative provision, and not by address. This he felt himself bound to declare as a peer of parliament faithfully discharging his duty; a duty which, he regretted, must cost him the pain of disagreeing with his noble friends.

The earl of Lauderdale combated the chief position of lord Grenville, and concluded by recommending an address to the prince of Wales.

(s) Her royal highness the princess Amelia departed this life, at Windsor, on the 2nd of November, after a long and painful illness. Her royal highness was born August 7, 1783, and was from early youth of a tender and delicate constitution, being frequently attacked with severe indispositions. Her disorder began to discover alarming symptoms about 1808. About a month before her death she was attacked with St. Anthony's fire, which brought on a relapse, and an extreme state of debility, under which she displayed the noblest Christian faith and fortitude during weeks of prolonged agony, uncheered by any ray of hope. For the last few days her strength had been rapidly wearing away, and she died without the least struggle or convulsion. She wished to present her royal father with a token of her filial duty and affection, before her demise; and she had the satisfaction of placing a ring on his finger, which was made by her directions for the express purpose, containing a small lock of her hair, inclosed in a crystal tablet, set round with a few sparks of diamonds. The effect of that present on his majesty's heart, the public have to deplore at this hour, (June 1813.) In consequence of a delay in sending an official notice of her royal highness's death to the dean of St. Paul's, caused by the death of the lord chamberlain, (lord Dartmouth,) the custom of tolling the great bell at St. Paul's did not take place till Sunday afternoon, November 4, immediately after a grand funeral anthem had been sung. The remains of her royal highness were, on the night of November 14, privately interred in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. The following is the inscription, (issued from the Herald's Office,) engraved on the plate of the coffin:

"Depositum
Illustrissimæ Principissæ Ameliæ,
Filiæ sextæ et Natu Minimæ
Augustissimi et potentissimi Georgii Tertii, Dei Gratia Britanniarum Regis,
Fidei Defensoris, &c.
Obiit IIda Die Novembris,
Anno Domini MDCCCX, Ætatis suæ XXVIII."

The

The next day, earl Camden presented the report of the committee appointed to examine the physicians (t).

On the motion of the earl of Liverpool, "That a committee be appointed to search for precedents on occasions similar to the present," it was carried.

In the commons, the same day, the house having resolved itself into a committee on the state of the nation, Mr. Lushington in the chair, the chancellor of the Exchequer, in a preliminary speech, submitted the three following propositions: 1. That it is the opinion of this house, "That his majesty is prevented by indisposition from coming to his parliament, and from attending to public business; and that the personal exercise of the royal authority is thereby for the present interrupted."—2. That it is the opinion of this house, "That it is the right and duty of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons of Great Britain now assembled, and lawfully, and freely, representing all the estates of the people of this realm, to provide the means of supplying the defect of the personal exercise of the royal authority, arising from his majesty's late indisposition, in such a manner as the exigency of the case may appear to require."—3. "That for this purpose, and for the maintaining entire the constitutional authority of the king, it is necessary that the lords spiritual and temporal and commons of Great Britain should determine on the means whereby the royal assent may be given in parliament to such bill as may be passed the two houses of parliament respecting the exercise of the powers and authorities of the crown, in the name and on the behalf of the king, during the continuance of his majesty's indisposition." The honourable gentleman then proceeded to state, that he should propose that his royal highness the prince of Wales should be appointed to exercise the office of regent, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, during the continuance of the king's indisposition: That, generally, all the powers of the government should be committed to his hands: That to her majesty the queen should be entrusted the care and guardianship of the king's person: That due provisions should be made to notify the king's recovery, and chalk out the course of proceedings by which his majesty might be enabled to re-assume his functions. These three provisions should have no limit in point of time, except what should arise from the duration of the king's indisposition. Taking all the circumstances connected with the king's indisposition into consideration, a limit should be placed on the prerogatives of the crown, when in the hands of the regent, for a twelvemonth; taking care that the limitation should expire during the sitting of parliament, and at least six weeks after it was convened. It would then be open for parliament to re-consider the subject; or, if they did not think that duty necessary, the termination of the restriction would have the advantage of having occurred under the eye and superintendence of the legislature. Upon these grounds, he thought that there should be a suspension for the same period of the power of granting any rank or dignity in the peerage, with certain exceptions. Also, that all pensions and offices granted should continue only during the continuance of the regent in office, unless subsequently approved and confirmed by his majesty: and, lastly, that to her majesty the queen, with the care of his royal person, should be committed the appointment to the several offices connected with his majesty's household, subject to the re-consideration of parliament. He had the authority of the late Dr. Willis for stating, that the shortest period, in which recovery from such disorders could be expected, was six weeks; that the average period was five or six months; and that from twelve months to twelve months and a half was the extreme point at which, if the most encouraging symptoms of recovery did not present themselves, the prospect became almost hopeless. The honourable gentleman then concluded by moving the first resolution, which was carried. On the second a warm discussion took place, in which sir F. Burdett, Messrs. Ponsonby, Canning, Adam, Horner, Croker, Whitbread, lords Castlereagh, Temple, and Jocelyn, and the attorney-general and solicitor-general participated.

The division being at length loudly called for, the second and third resolutions were carried by two hundred and sixty-nine to one hundred and fifty-seven. Adjourned.

The day following, December 21, a considerable discussion took place, when the house divided on the second resolution—ayes ninety-eight, noes fifteen. The third resolution was subsequently carried.

On the 27th of December, in the house of lords, the earl of Carlisle, on the lord chancellor's taking the woolsack, commented on the delay in submitting the subject of the sovereign's indisposition to parliament, and providing for the defect in the kingly office. The different view given by the bulletins of his majesty's health, from those held out by ministers, he could not suffer to pass without remark—their object was procrastination, and they had succeeded. He should not make any specific motion on the subject; but should suggest the propriety of a re-examination of the physicians, particularly on account of the contents of recent bulletins.

The house having resolved itself into a committee on the state of the nation, the earl of Liverpool, after exculpating himself, and his colleagues from all blame for delay, or for any proposals they made to parliament, declared it was impossible to avoid great difficulties with respect to any arrangements; he therefore moved, that their lordships do agree to the resolutions communicated by the other house.

The first resolution was then put and carried. On the second and third, a considerable debate arose, but they were subsequently carried.

On the 31st of December, in the house of commons, a conference took place with the lords, who notified their agreement to the resolutions which were communicated in a conference on the 22d.

The house having resolved itself into a committee on the state of the nation, the chancellor of the Exchequer said, that it was the intention of his majesty's servants to propose the transferrence of the executive authority to his royal highness the prince of Wales, accompanied with certain specified exceptions, which are, however, only to be the operative for a limited time. These exceptions extend to the granting of peerages, pensions, and places for life, for the period of twelve months. The care of his majesty's person to be entrusted to the queen, assisted by a council; and that her majesty have power to remove from, or nominate persons, to his majesty's household. On the question being put, this proposition was agreed to.

Although we have closed our account of the parliamentary history for the year 1810, it is proper to continue it to the appointment of the regent, that the whole of the transactions in the houses of lords and commons relative to that important business may be seen at one view. Accordingly, in the house of commons, on the 1st of January, 1811, the house having resolved itself into a committee, Mr. Perceval, after dwelling upon the shock his majesty's feelings would sustain upon recovery, if he found any material alteration in his household, declared, that, if a separate establishment for the regent was thought necessary, the expence would not exceed fifteen thousand pounds. He then submitted the following resolution: "That it appears to this committee, that the care of his majesty's royal person, during the continuance of his majesty's illness, should be committed to the queen's most excellent majesty; and that her majesty should have power to remove from, and to nominate and appoint such persons as she shall think proper, to the several offices in his majesty's household, and to dispose, order, and manage, all other matters and things relating to the care of his majesty's royal person, during the time aforesaid; and that, for the better enabling her majesty to discharge this important trust, it is also expedient that a council should be appointed, to advise and assist her majesty in the several matters aforesaid, and with power from time to time, as they may see cause, to examine upon oath the physicians and others attending his majesty's person, touching the state of his majesty's health, and all matters relative thereto."

(t) It appears, by the report of the lords' committee, that the king's illness began in a gentle form on the 3d of October; that it continued unabated till the 25th, when his majesty himself first consulted sir H. Halford on the propriety of taking medicine; on the 28th, he became incapable of transacting business. In the first week of November, his disorder was at the highest pitch to which it had ever yet reached. The last of the royal family that saw him was the queen; and he was twice visited by the lord chancellor, and once by the chancellor of the exchequer. All the physicians were of opinion that his majesty would recover, and be capable of transacting business: this opinion they founded on the soundness of his majesty's constitution, preserved by his temperate habits of life; but they declined limiting his recovery to any period. Dr. Willis made a curious distinction between mental derangements and insanity, and thought his majesty's disorder ought to be placed between them.—The report of the committee appointed by the house of commons was nearly to the same purport.

Lord

Lord Gower dissented, and proposed, as an amendment, that that part of the motion from the words "queen's most excellent majesty" should be omitted, and that there be inserted in its place, "together with such direction of his household as may be suitable for the care of his majesty's royal person, and the maintenance of the royal dignity." An animated discussion ensued; when the house divided, ayes two hundred and twenty-six, noes two hundred and thirteen—majority against ministers thirteen.

The next day, January 2, the report of the committee on the state of the nation was presented by Mr. Lushington. The resolutions being read, the question was put, that the report be received; when a long and animated discussion arose. Lord Porchester proposed, as an amendment to the first resolution, that the concluding words—"subject to such limitations and exceptions as shall hereafter be provided," be left out; but no division took place on it: and the chancellor of the exchequer having moved an amendment to the same resolution, which went to restore it to its original state, it was lost by a majority of three.

In the house of lords, January 4, in a committee on the state of the nation, the earl of Liverpool moved the reading of the resolutions which had been brought up from the commons. He said, that great maxim of the constitution, "the king can do no wrong," ought always to be kept in view; and applying it to the prince of Wales, should he, in the capacity of regent, become possessed of regal power, care should be taken that he should be made incapable of doing wrong. His lordship, after dwelling upon the resolutions, declared that the first four had his perfect concurrence, but it would be necessary to amend the fifth. He concluded by moving the question upon the first resolution. To this the marquis of Lansdowne objected, and moved, that all that part of the first resolution, connected with and following the words "subject to such limitations and restrictions, as shall be provided," &c. be omitted.

A division taking place on the marquis of Lansdowne's amendment to the first resolution, there appeared for it one hundred and five, against it one hundred and two; majority against ministers three.

The earl of Liverpool then proposed an amendment to the second resolution, by omitting the power given to the regent to appoint peers in cases of naval or military atchievements; and extending the restrictions generally to the grant of peerages, by which he met the wishes of lord Grenville: for the amendment one hundred and six, against it one hundred; majority in favour of ministers six.

The third and fourth resolutions were carried without a division.

An amendment being proposed by lord Liverpool to the fifth resolution, respecting the household, restoring it to its original state as proposed by the chancellor of the exchequer in the lower house, the numbers were, ayes ninety-seven, noes one hundred and ten; majority against ministers thirteen.

In the house of lords, January 8, the lord president and the lord privy seal were appointed to attend the prince of Wales with the address, requesting his royal highness to take upon himself the regency, in conformity with the terms of the resolution; and earls Harcourt and Morton to attend the queen.

In the commons, the same day, Messrs. Perceval, Ryder, R. Dundas, and the Master of the Rolls, were appointed to accompany the lords president and privy seal with the address to the prince of Wales; and lords J. Thynne, Clive, Palmerston, and colonel Disbrowe, to attend her majesty.

On the 10th, the deputation appointed to wait on her majesty, proceeded to Windsor, with the address of the two houses, expressing a hope that her majesty would be graciously pleased to undertake the important duties proposed to be invested in her majesty, so soon as an act of parliament should have passed for carrying the said resolution into effect. To which her majesty assented, and signified her assent thereto in a short but well-turned speech.

And on the 11th, at two o'clock, the deputation from the two houses went to Carleton House, to present to his royal highness the resolutions to which the two houses, after long discussion, had agreed to. The lords and gentlemen, all in full dress, were ushered through the superb suite of rooms to the drawing-room, where his royal highness stood. The deputation advanced according to their order of precedency, making the usual reverences. The lord president then read from a paper in his hand—"That they were a committee appointed to attend his royal highness with the resolutions which had been agreed to by the lords and commons, for the purpose of supplying the defect of the personal exercise of the royal authority, during his majesty's illness, by empowering his royal highness to exercise that authority in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, subject to such limitations and restrictions as shall be provided. And that they were directed to express the hope which the lords spiritual and temporal and commons entertain, that his royal highness, from his regard to the interests of his majesty, will be ready to undertake the weighty and important trust proposed to be invested in his royal highness, as soon as an act of parliament shall have been passed for carrying the said resolutions into effect."

To which his royal highness made the following reply:

"My lords and gentlemen—I receive the communication which the two houses have directed you to make to me, of their joint resolutions, on the subject of providing for the exercise of the royal authority during his majesty's illness, with those sentiments of regard which I must ever entertain for the united desires of the two houses.—With the same sentiments I receive the expressed hopes of the lords and commons, 'that, from my regard for the interest of his majesty and the nation, I should be ready to undertake the weighty and important trust proposed to be invested in me,' under the restrictions and limitations stated in those resolutions.—Conscious that every feeling of my heart would have prompted me, from dutiful affection to my beloved father and sovereign, to have shewn all the reverential delicacy towards him inculcated in those resolutions, I cannot refrain from expressing my regret, that I should not have been allowed the opportunity of manifesting to his afflicted and loyal subjects that such would have been my conduct.—Deeply impressed, however, with the necessity of tranquillizing the public mind, and determined to submit to every personal sacrifice consistent with the regard I owe to the security of my father's crown, and the equal regard I owe to the welfare of his people, I do not hesitate to accept the office and situation proposed to me, restricted as they are, still retaining every opinion expressed by me upon a former and similar distressing occasion. In undertaking the trust proposed to me, I am well aware of the difficulties of the situation in which I shall be placed; but I shall rely with confidence upon the constitutional advice of an enlightened parliament, and the zealous support of a generous and loyal people. I will use all the means left to me to merit both.

"My lords and gentlemen—You will communicate this my answer to the two houses, accompanied by my most fervent wishes and prayers, that the Divine Will may extricate us and the nation from the grievous embarrassments of our present condition, by the speedy restoration of his majesty's health."

In the house of lords, the same day, the earl of Liverpool, after an explanation, stating that the names of the duke of York and one of his royal brothers had been omitted at their request, moved the issuing of letters patent under the great seal for opening parliament by commission.

The house divided on the motion—Contents, fifty-one; non-contents, thirty-three.

In the house of lords, on January 15, the lord chancellor, the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord president, the lord privy seal, the duke of Montrose, and the earl of Liverpool, having taken their seats as commissioners to open parliament, and the speaker of the house of commons with a number of members being in attendance at the bar, the lord chancellor said,—"My lords and gentlemen, Forasmuch as for certain causes his majesty cannot conveniently be present here in his royal person, a commission has been issued under the great seal, authorizing the lords in the said commission named, to declare the causes of your meeting, and to do in all respects in his majesty's name, which commission you will now hear read." The commission was then read, after which the lord chancellor resumed—"My lords and gentlemen, in virtue of the commission which has been now read, authorizing the lords therein named to declare the causes of your meeting, and to do in all respects in his majesty's name, we have only to call your attention to the afflicting circumstance of his majesty's indisposition, and to the necessity of making due and suitable provision for the care of his majesty's sacred person, for the maintenance of the royal dignity, and for the exercise of the royal authority, in such manner and to such extent as the exigency of the case may seem to require."

On the 16th, the regency bill was read a second time.

On the 17th, The house went into a committee on the regency bill; when thirteen of the clauses were, after much discussion, disposed of.

The next day, the house resolved itself into a committee, when the clauses in the regency bill were discussed, and the blanks filled up.

On the 21st, the report of the regency bill was ordered to be taken into consideration; and on the question that the amendments be read, sir F. Burdett vehemently opposed it, declaring that to have a person at the head of affairs, who had long been incapable of signing his name to a document without some one to guide his hand; a person long incapable of receiving petitions, of even holding a levee, or discharging the most ordinary functions of his office, and now afflicted with a severe mental malady, was a most mischievous example to the people of this country, while it had a tendency to expose the government to the contempt of foreign powers.

A discussion then arose on amendments being proposed by the opponents of ministers to several clauses, with a view of divesting the bill of the restraints upon the regent's government; but they were uniformly rejected.

In the commons, on the 23rd of January, the motion for reading the regency bill a third time produced a short discussion; after which the bill was passed.

In the house of lords, January 25, the house resolved itself into a committee on the regency bill.

On the clause limiting the period of the restrictions to the 1st of February, 1812, lord Grenville proposed to insert August instead of February, which would give six months for the duration of the restrictions.

After a considerable debate, the committee divided on the motion, "that the words of the original clause should stand part of the bill;" when the numbers were—Contents ninety-six; non-contents one hundred and eight—majority against ministers twelve. On the marquis of Lansdowne's amendment; contents one hundred and seven, non-contents ninety-eight—majority against ministers nine.

On the 28th, the order of the day being read, for taking into consideration the report of the regency bill, the duke of Sussex addressed their lordships at great length, and with much warmth, against the bill.

Lord Grenville moved an amendment to the clause for limiting the period of the restrictions till the 1st of February, 1812, by proposing that the word "August" be inserted instead of the word "February." At length, after a vehement debate, a division on lord Grenville's amendment took place:—contents eighty-four, proxies thirty-eight—non-contents eighty-eight, proxies fifty-one, majority for ministers seventeen. Six other divisions followed, the result of which was, that the amendments made in the committee, where absentees were not allowed to vote by proxy, were all over-ruled; and the bill restored to the state in which it came from the commons, with the exception of some verbal alterations.

The regency bill was passed on the 29th, and sent to the commons, with a message desiring their concurrence to the amendments. And on the 31st, the amendments to the regency bill were agreed to by the commons.

The regency bill, with amendments, was brought up to the house of lords on the 1st of February. The earl of Liverpool laid on the table the proposed form of the commission for giving the royal assent to the regency bill; and gave notice of his intention to move a resolution on the subject to-morrow, if no observations were likely to be made that would lead to debate; or of postponing it till Monday, if a discussion was likely to arise.

On the 2nd, the earl of Liverpool proposed a resolution authorizing certain lords to apply the great seal to a commission for granting the royal assent to the regency bill.

In the house of commons, February 4, subsequently to a conference with the lords, Mr. Dundas appeared at the bar with a resolution of the lords, in which they desired the concurrence of the commons to the following resolution: "That it is expedient and necessary that letters patent, under the great seal, be issued for the purpose of giving an assent in the king's name to the regency bill. This resolution, after a vehement debate, which was not entirely free from some portion of illiberality, was carried.

In the house of lords, February 5, another conference took place between their lordships and the commons, which was followed by an announcement that the resolution of Saturday, February 2, had passed the other house. Their lordships afterwards temporarily adjourned; when the lord chancellor entering in his robes, stated that a commission had issued under the great seal, for giving the royal assent to an act which had passed both houses of parliament. The archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, earls Camden and Westmoreland, and the duke of Montrose, afterwards took their seats as commissioners for giving the royal assent to the regency bill. The speaker and a number of members of the house of commons being in attendance at the bar, the lord chancellor said:

"My lords and gentlemen, Inasmuch as, for certain causes, his majesty cannot conveniently be present here this day, a commission has issued under the great seal, to us and other lords directed, reciting the letters patent of the 15th January, for opening and holding this present parliament, and the passing of an act agreed upon by both houses, and notifying the royal assent to the said act."

The commission having been read, the lord chancellor declared, "that in obedience to the commands, and by virtue of the powers vested in the commissioners, they gave his majesty's royal assent to the said act."

On the 12th, the lord chancellor, the archbishop of Canterbury, earls Camden and Westmoreland, and the duke of Montrose, having taken their seats as commissioners; and the speaker, with many members of the lower house, being in attendance, the lord chancellor said, that it not being convenient for his royal highness the prince of Wales, regent, to be personally present that day, a commission had issued under his majesty's great seal, authorising the opening and declaring certain further causes for holding that parliament.

The commission was then read pro formâ; after which the lord chancellor delivered a speech from his royal highness.

The commons then withdrew from the bar, and the commissioners quitted their bench. The lord chancellor having taken the chair, the earl of Aberdeen, after dwelling upon the principal topics of the speech, moved an address to the prince regent, expressing their confidence in his royal highness, and condoling with him on the death of the princess Amelia; which, after some trifling dissent, was agreed to.

In the commons, the same day, the speaker and the other members having returned from hearing the speech of the prince regent read, Mr. Milnes moved an address to the prince regent; which was carried, and a committee appointed to prepare the same.

And on the 13th of February, Mr. Milnes presented at the bar the report of the committee on the address to the prince regent, which after some discussion was agreed to.

The remainder of the parliamentary transactions of this session were but of trifling import, and on the 24th of July the houses of lords and commons being met, the deputy usher of the black rod having summoned the house of commons to attend in the house of lords, to hear the royal assent, by commission, given to the gold coin bill, and the militia interchange amendment bill; which being done, the lords commissioners authorized by the letters patent of the prince regent in the name of his majesty, proceeded to read the regent's speech on the occasion: after which a commission for proroguing the parliament was read; and the lord chancellor, in obedience to the commands of his royal highness the prince regent, in the name and on behalf of his majesty, prorogued this parliament to Thursday, the 22d day of August next, to be then here holden.

The 22d of August, being the day to which the parliament was prorogued, the lord chancellor took the woolsack in the house of lords, when the commons being sent for, Mr. Ley, jun. assistant clerk of the lower house attended at the bar. His royal highness the prince regent's commission for farther proroguing the parliament was then read; which declared the parliament farther prorogued until Friday the 4th day of October; when the houses met, and parliament was farther prorogued until the end of November.

The generality of the debates which followed, on the assembling of the parliament, being of little import, we do not see the least necessity for entering into a detail of them, but shall immediately advert to our affairs in other parts of the world.

The day after the delivery of the prince regent's speech in the house of lords, when he accepted the office of regent, an Extraordinary Gazette was published, a supplement to which appeared on the 15th. These contained details of the military and naval transactions which took place place on the capture of the isles of France (u) and Banda, the only remaining possessions of the French in the Indian seas. By the capitulation of the isle of France, the land and sea forces, officers, subalterns, and privates, were to retain their effects and baggage; not to be considered as prisoners of war, but to be conveyed, at British expence, with their families, to some parts in European France. Private property, of course, was to be respected, and the inhabitants maintained in their religion, customs, and laws. The following vessels were found at port Napoleon; La Minerva, fifty-two guns; La Bellona, forty-eight; L'Astrée, forty-four; La Manchée, forty-four; Iphigenie, thirty-six; Nereide, thirty-six; (these two were formerly English frigates;) Le Victor, sloop, twenty-two; L'Entreprenant, fourteen; and a new brig (name unknown) fourteen; The Charlton, Ceylon, and United Kingdom, (formerly English East Indiamen;) and twenty-eight merchant vessels of various burdens, from one hundred and fifty to one thousand tons; besides five gun brigs.

On the 5th of March, 1811, an attack was made by general Graham, with the division under his command, upon the French army under marshal Victor, before Cadiz, composed of the two divisions of Rufin and Laval. The contest was severe, and the result most brilliant and victorious on the part of the allies. Marshal Victor's force consisted of eight thousand men; that of general Graham five thousand British and Spanish troops. The loss of the enemy was very considerable; the field being covered with their slain, not less than thirteen hundred men being stated to have fallen. Besides which, the allies took generals Rufin, Rousseau, and Bellegarde, (the former of whom was wounded, and the second of whom died afterwards of the wounds he received,) and about four hundred and twenty rank and file; together with an eagle and six pieces of cannon. The loss on the side of the allies consisted of one thousand two hundred and forty-three killed and wounded; but most of the latter were expected to recover. When the expedition against the rear of the French was planned, an arrangement for an attack on the French batteries in Cadiz bay, for the purpose of operating a diversion, was made. But this attack, on account of the unfavourable weather, could not be executed till the 6th, the day after general Graham's action, when it was carried into effect, with all the bravery and coolness of British seamen. All the batteries on the east side of the bay, from Rota to St. Mary's, with the exception of Fort Catalina were carried by storm, the guns spiked, and the works destroyed.

On the 25th of March, marshal Beresford had a partial action with the enemy near Campo Major, by which it appears, that the French were pursued to Badajoz, with the loss of between five and six hundred men. The loss on the side of the allies amounted to twenty-four killed, sixty-nine wounded, and seventy-seven missing. The enemy abandoned a considerable supply of provisions when they left Campo Major. They likewise abandoned Albuquerque.

By a dispatch from marshal Beresford, dated April 13, 1811, it appeared, that having completed the bridges over the Guadiana, he crossed that river on the 5th, and that the French attacked his advanced posts on the 7th, in the neighbourhood of Olivença, but were repulsed with loss. The French then withdrew the garrisons, excepting three hundred men from Olivença, and three battalions from Badajoz, on the same day; and on the 8th, the whole corps of Mortier, consisting of six thousand men, took up a position between Albaeira and Santa Martha. General Cole laid siege to Olivença, which surrendered on the 14th, and marshal Beresford had his head quarters on the 12th at Santa Martha, the enemy having retired.

By dispatches from lord Wellington, dated the 8th and 10th of May, it appeared, that the enemy's whole army, consisting of the second, sixth, and 8th corps, and all the cavalry that could be collected in Castile and Leon, including nine hundred of the imperial guard, together with some battalions of the ninth corps, crossed the Agueda at Ciudad Rodrigo, on the 9th, and made two desperate attacks on the British army, for the purpose of relieving Almeida. The contest, though very severe, terminated in the compleat repulse of the enemy, and the allied army continued to hold its position. On the 7th, at night, the French army retired from the position which they occupied on the preceding day on the Duas Casas. On the 8th, the enemy continued their retreat to the woods between Calligoes Espejas and Fuentes de Honor. On the 9th, they crossed the Azava; and on the 10th, the Agueda, leaving Almeida to its fate. In the action of the 3rd of May, the British loss consisted of twenty-two killed and one hundred and seventy-one wounded; that of the Portuguese, fourteen killed and thirty-three wounded. On the 5th, the British loss consisted of one hundred and forty-eight killed and eight hundred and seventy-two wounded; the Portuguese loss, fifty killed and one hundred and fifty-eight wounded. The number of the allies missing on the two days was three hundred and sixteen. The enemy's loss was much more severe.

Indeed, since Massena's retreat from Portugal, which happened but a little time before these partial actions took place, it was confidently asserted, that the French armies were either destroyed, or reduced to so disorganized a state as to render their escape from Spain problematical; and that the return of Massena to Paris was occasioned by a conviction, that nothing more on the part of the French could be achieved in Spain or Portugal. This, however, appears to have been very far from the truth; for by the advices which were received from the Peninsula about the close of June, our affairs seemed to wear a serious aspect. By these advices we learn, that marshal Soult made his re-appearance at the head of thirty thousand men, on the same ground where the last battle was fought; after which battle lord Wellington laid siege to Badajoz; but by the fresh movements of the French, his lordship was compelled to raise the siege of that town. Marshal Marmont advanced from Placentia in Spain, with a large French force; Massena also, with the remains of his army, returned, with a view to join Soult; the French raised the siege of Cadiz, and marshal Victor advanced with his forces, to strengthen the main army under Soult: in consequence of which movements, the advanced guards of the two armies had an action near Albuera, in which the French were said to have lost two thousand men in killed and wounded; but the loss on the part of the allies was stated to have been nearly equivalent.

Previous to lord Wellington's abandoning the siege of Badajoz, he made two sanguinary attempts to take the place by storm, but he was completely unsuccessful, and lost about eight hundred men. His lordship, however, candidly confessed, "that he was unfortunately mistaken in his estimate of the quality of the means necessary to take the place (v)".

The fall of Tarragona, which the French took possession of, occasioned great discomfiture in the minds of the Spaniards; fears were entertained for other important places; and these were in some measure realized by the surrender of Figueras, at discretion, on the 19th of July. The garrison consisted of three thousand five hundred men, and near three hundred and fifty officers. The blockade of Figueras lasted four months, during which time two thousand men perished within the walls.

On the 20th of September, captain Carteret, of his majesty's ship Naiad, had an action with part of the Boulogne flotilla of gun boats and praams. This action was fought in the presence, and at the particular instance of the French emperor, who conceived that the capture of the Naiad would have been the consequence. In this, however, he was sadly disappointed, and had the mortification to behold one of his praams, bearing a commodore's flag, taken by the English, which with a good glass he might have seen shortly after the battle safe under the guns of Dover Castle.

Ciudad Rodrigo had been for some time blockaded by the English under lord Wellington, and a considerable body of Portuguese and Spanish auxiliaries; the French were said to have totally evacuated Portugal, but they suddenly returned with a view to relieve that important fortress; in consequence of which a desperate battle was

(u) The isle of France is about thirty-three miles long and twenty-one broad. The Abbé Raynal says of this island, "What a misfortune for France should she suffer herself to be deprived of it."

(v) On the 9th of June, 1811, the British army in Portugal amounted to fifty thousand men; of which number thirty thousand were stated to be actually fit for duty; seven thousand wounded, but doing well, and likely to be able in a short time to return to their duty; and five thousand sick, which was stated to be no extraordinary number, as the unhealthy season had commenced at the time this account was made up.—The thirteenth regiment of light dragoons went out to Portugal about eighteen months prior to this period, and were nearly one thousand strong; since that time, however, they received reinforcements, at different times, to the amount of five hundred; but so constantly had they been in action, and so severely did they suffer, that on the 1st of July, 1811, they could only muster sixty men and horses fit for duty.

fought,

fought, in which the French were completely successful, and the English raised the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, towards the close of September. By lord Wellington's dispatches it appears, that "the Portuguese artillerymen attached to the guns, which were for a moment in the enemy's possession, were cut down at their guns." Again, "The enemy having collected for the object of relieving Ciudad Rodrigo, the army of the North, which were withdrawn from the attack which they commenced on general Abadia in Gallicia, in which are included twenty-two battalions of the imperial guard, and general Souham's division of infantry, composed of troops recently arrived in Spain from the army of Naples, and now drawn from the frontiers of Navarre, where they had been employed in operations against Mina, together with five divisions, and all the cavalry of the army called of Portugal, composing an army of not less than sixty thousand men, of which six thousand were cavalry, and one hundred and twenty-five pieces of artillery; I could not maintain the blockade of Ciudad Rodrigo, nor could any efforts which I could make, prevent, or materially impede the collection of the supplies, or the march of the convoy for the relief of that place. I did all that I could expect to effect without incurring the risk of great loss for no object; and as the reports, as usual, were so various, in regard to the enemy's real strength, it was necessary that I should see their army." This battle was fought on the 25th of September, and by lord Wellington's return of killed, wounded, and missing, it appeared that the total was, of the English, one hundred and sixty-one; and of the Portuguese, one hundred. By this defeat lord Wellington retreated sixty miles from the field of battle, to Trexada, where his second dispatch is dated from.

After the relief of Ciudad Rodrigo, marshal Suchet advanced against general Blake, and completely defeated the Spanish army under his command. After twenty days' labour and fatigue, Suchet informs us, he succeeded in making a practicable breach in the walls of the castle of Saguntum; but during this period general Blake, with a view to save Saguntum from falling into the hands of the French, advanced to give Suchet battle, and compel him to raise the siege. This was on the 24th of October; a battle ensued, and the result was, that after seven hours hard fighting, the Spaniards were entirely broken and put to flight, with the loss of six thousand five hundred killed, wounded, and prisoners: the latter amounted to four thousand six hundred and thirty-nine, of whom two hundred and thirty were officers, forty colonels or lieutenant-colonels, two field marshals, sixteen pieces of artillery, eight caissons, four thousand two hundred and eight English muskets, and four stand of colours. The day after this battle, which was fought on the 25th of October, Suchet summoned the castle of Saguntum to surrender; and the lieutenant-colonel of artillery, who was sent with an answer to the summons, was conducted through the midst of the officers and prisoners, that he might have no doubt as to the issue of the battle which had taken place the day before. Saguntum accordingly surrendered, and the garrison, added to the men taken from the army under general Blake made the total amount of prisoners seven thousand two hundred and eleven, of whom upwards of three hundred and sixty-nine were officers.

On the other side, general Girard having crossed the Guadiana, and taken a position at Caceres, with a body of French, lord Wellington directed general Hill to endeavour to dispossess him. General Girard, however, left Caceres, and arrived at Arroyados Molinos, on the morning of the 28th of October, when he was surprized by general Hill, and a battle ensued; the result of which was, that two hundred French were killed, and one thousand taken prisoners, including general Biron and the prince d'Aremberg, two colonels, and forty officers, with all their artillery and baggage. General Girard was badly wounded.

After the fall of Saguntum, the key to Valencia, general Blake threw himself into it with seventeen thousand men: Suchet, however, continued his approaches, and, on the 26th of December, made a furious attack upon the Spanish lines. After a slight resistance, these were broken, and the whole army put to the rout. Blake, with about five thousand men effected his escape into the city, whilst Mahi and the other Spanish generals retreated to Allayada.

On the 29th of December, general Hill surprized and took Merida, with very little loss, as appears by his letter to lord Wellington of the 30th, the French having evacuated it during the night.

On the 12th of January, 1812, Suchet sent an account of the capture of Valencia to his government, which capitulated on the 9th. He says, that the lines were six thousand toises in extent, and that Valencia expended twelve millions of reals, and employed some thousands of men for two years in erecting them. By the surrender of Valencia the French took three hundred and seventy-four pieces of artillery, one hundred and eighty thousand pounds of powder, three millions of cartridges, sixteen thousand one hundred and thirty-one prisoners of the line, one thousand nine hundred and fifty sick in the hospitals, one thousand eight hundred cavalry and artillery horses, twenty-one stands of colours, eight hundred and ninety-three officers, twenty-two generals or brigadiers. Bonaparte on this occasion, justly appreciating the value of this conquest, and the merits of Suchet, created him duke of Albufera.

On the 19th of the same month, lord Wellington took Ciudad Rodrigo by storm. But the surrender of Valencia was a conquest of by far the greater moment. By the acquisition of Valencia, Suchet obtained possession not only of the chief part of the Spanish regular forces, consisting of upwards of sixteen thousand men, but also of an entire province, which from its situation gave him the command of the sea-coast of the Mediterranean, from Barcelona to the Straits of Gibraltar; while lord Wellington, by the capture of Ciudad Rodrigo, gained only a small portion of territory.

Some time after the taking of Ciudad Rodrigo, lord Wellington laid siege to Badajoz. On the 25th of March he opened batteries on an outwork of that fortress called La Picwina, which he took by storm on the 26th. By the return of killed, wounded, and missing, from the 18th to the 26th, it appears that we lost, nine officers, five serjeants, one drummer, one hundred and fourteen rank and file killed; thirty-four officers, twenty serjeants, two drummers, five hundred and thirty rank and file wounded; and eleven rank and file missing. At length, on the 6th of April, Badajoz was taken by storm; but by lord Wellington's return of the killed and wounded, it will appear that the conquest was dearly bought,—seventy-two officers, fifty-one serjeants, two drummers, nine hundred and ten rank and file, killed; three hundred and six officers, two hundred and sixteen serjeants, seventeen drummers, three thousand two hundred and forty-three rank and file wounded; and one serjeant and sixty-two rank and file missing.

Thus it appears, that to obtain possession of Badajoz, we lost nearly five thousand brave men. On the night of the storming of Badajoz, which was not in our possession till after six hours hard fighting, a letter from an English officer says, the carnage was horrible to the last degree. The French had employed every imaginable contrivance for repelling the assault. From the peculiar situation of the place it was necessary to scale, although a large breach was effected: the enemy threw down the ladders as fast as they were reared, and thus precipitated whole companies into the fosse. When at last our men established themselves on the walls and leaped down, they fell on chevaux de frize formed of old swords ground to the utmost sharpness. There were trenches and breastworks across the streets, and these also undermined ready for blowing up.

While lord Wellington was employed in the siege of Badajoz, the French were by no means inactive: they made a very considerable diversion on the northern bank of the Tagus, which, though not successful in the relief of Badajoz, its original intent, was yet productive of very injurious consequences. Marmont overrun an immense range of country, even to the vicinity of Abrantes. In this excursion the plunder he acquired was considerable, but the property he destroyed was much greater. On the south of the Tagus, however, the British arms were crowned with success. The cavalry of Soult, with a similar view to that of Marmont, had advanced as far as Villa Franca, where they were overtaken and defeated by sir Stapylton Cotton. During the action the enemy's loss was very considerable, and about one hundred and fifty prisoners, including a lieutenant-colonel, two captains, and one lieutenant, with about one hundred and thirty horses, were brought off the field.

On the 19th of May, general sir Rowland Hill obtained a victory over the French at Almarez, in which the enemy had about one hundred killed and three hundred taken prisoners. The loss on the part of the English was one captain, one lieutenant, one serjeant, thirty rank and file killed; two captains, six lieutenants, five ensigns, ten serjeants, jeants, one drummer, and one hundred and twenty rank and file wounded.

In consequence of the success of general Hill, lord Wellington advanced towards Salamanca, which he reached on the 16th of June. The same night the enemy evacuated the town, leaving about eight hundred men in the fortifications which they had erected on the ruins of the colleges and convents which they had destroyed. The British entered the town on the 17th. While the French were in possession of Salamanca, they destroyed thirteen out of twenty-five convents, and twenty-two out of twenty-five colleges, which existed in this celebrated seat of learning.

Major-general Slade had an action with his cavalry against that of the French under general L'Allemand. At first the British appeared to be successful, and the French retreated; but returning to the charge they completely threw the English into confusion, and repulsed them. The loss on the part of the English was, two serjeants, twenty rank and file killed; twenty-six rank and file wounded; two officers, ten serjeants, one hundred and six rank and file missing; one officer's horse wounded; one missing; six troop of horses killed; fourteen wounded; one hundred and twenty-seven missing. Those that were missing it appears were taken prisoners by the French.

Lord Wellington, however, although he had entered Salamanca on the 17th of June, did not obtain possession of the forts till the 27th, which were garrisoned by only eight hundred men, as above stated; but, from his return of killed and wounded, it appears that he must have had a difficult task to get possession of them. He states, that the loss of the allied army employed against Salamanca was, two captains, three lieutenants, one ensign, five serjeants, one drummer, and one hundred and three rank and file, and twenty-eight horses, killed; one general staff, one lieutenant-colonel, one major, ten captains, ten lieutenants, five ensigns, fourteen serjeants, seven drummers, and three hundred and thirty-three rank and file, wounded; two lieutenants, eleven rank and file, and five horses, missing. Grand total of killed, wounded, and missing, five hundred and nine!—The grand total of prisoners taken in the forts of St. Vincente, St. Cayetans, and La Merced, at Salamanca, amounted to seven hundred and six!

On the 21st of July, the French army under the command of Marshal Marmont was defeated by that of the allies, commanded by lord Wellington, duke of Ciudad Rodrigo, in the fields of Salamanca, after seven hours continued firing, in which the infantry, as well as the cavalry and artillery of both nations did prodigies of valour. The French were successively dislodged from their advantageous positions, and lost all the artillery which they had placed there. Their loss in men was estimated at ten or twelve thousand, more than four thousand being taken prisoners. The loss of the allies in killed, wounded, and missing, by the return made afterwards was five thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine (w).

Dispatches were received from the marquis of Wellington, dated the 13th and 15th of August, which contain intelligence of the allied army having entered Madrid, after an inconsiderable resistance on the 12th. On the capture of Madrid the allies took two thousand five hundred prisoners, one hundred and eighty-nine pieces of cannon, nine hundred barrels of powder, twenty-three thousand two hundred and fifty-four stand of arms, and great magazines of clothing, provisions, and ammunition. It seems that lord Wellington, having entirely dispersed Marmont's army, and ascertained that the remains had retreated upon Burgos, he felt himself at liberty to look for more important points of enterprize, and moved from Cuestar, on the 6th of August, to Segovia and St. Ildefonso, on his route to Madrid. In this advance the Portuguese cavalry under general D'Urban suffered a severe check, having been seized with a panic prior to a charge on a body of French cavalry which defended a pass near Majalahonda. The English, however, arriving, the enemy retreated, leaving some guns which had been captured in this unfortunate affair. At length the allied army reached the capital of Spain, and lord Wellington, by the prompt and energetic measures which he adopted, soon obtained possession of the place.

Lord Wellington had for some time laid siege to Burgos, but had hitherto been able to make but little progress for want of a sufficient quantity of battering cannon. He lost during the siege a great number of men. He had sprung several mines, but was repulsed with loss in every attempt. At length on the 18th of October, the mine which he had prepared was sprung at seven in the morning; but the French had been employed in countermining it, and their mine exploded at the same time. Our brave troops immediately stormed the castle, but without success: we lost in this attempt upwards of one hundred men killed, and a great many more wounded. So much time having been consumed before this well defended fortress gave opportunity to marshal Soult and king Joseph, in great force, to advance towards Madrid. Fearing, therefore, that we were not secure in the possession of the capital, lord Wellington determined to raise the siege of Burgos, and advance to the relief of Madrid. He consequently raised the siege of the castle of Burgos on the 21st of October, leaving the rear guard of our army, under sir Edward Paget, but without the least hope of his being successful. Lord Wellington, however, found it prudent to abandon Madrid, and continue his retreat to Portugal, for it would have been the height of madness to have risked a battle with the French forces for the salvation of the capital. Lord Wellington, when joined by general Hill, had about fifty thousand effective men; but Marmont's army, consisting of near forty thousand men, was expected shortly to join marshal Soult, whose army amounted to between fifty and sixty thousand, so that it was probable he would have been completely overwhelmed, had he not continued his retreat.

On the 24th of October, general Ballasteros addressed a letter to the minister at war, dated Head Quarters, Grenada, in which he declined to serve under lord Wellington; in consequence of which he was dismissed from his command in the Spanish army. From this time till April 1813, nothing of any importance took place between the adverse armies in the Peninsula: they seemed to be in a measure inactive, each party appearing to keep the other in check, but neither of them daring to adopt offensive operations. At length, as appears by the dispatch, dated Castalla, April 14, a battle was fought on the preceding day, between general Murray and Suchet, who commanded the French army in person. The French loss amounted "fully to three thousand men. Upwards of eight hundred men were buried only in front of one part of the line." The loss on the part of the allies amounted to six hundred and fifty-eight in killed, wounded, and missing, of whom one hundred and forty-five were killed. This appears rather incredible: that the loss on the part of the enemy in killed should amount to seven times as many as that of the allies is rather too much for us to believe.

Having brought our history of the war in the Peninsula of Spain and Portugal to the latest period, we shall now endeavour to give as clear an account of the Russian war as our limits will admit. We have before had occasion to advert to the falsity of the Russian bulletins during the former war, and we do not find that those of the present are deserving of greater credit; we shall therefore draw our account from such documents as appear to be least liable to objection.

Towards the close of the year 1810, Russia altered her political system: the Ukase respecting commerce was its first act (x). In February, 1811, five divisions of the Russian army quitted the Danube by forced marches, and proceeded to Poland. By this movement Russia sacrificed Wallachia and Moldavia. When the Russian armies were united and formed, a protest against France appeared, which was transmitted to every cabinet. Russia by that announced, that she felt no wish even to save appearances; and all means of conciliation employed on the part of France were ineffectual.

(w) General Marmont was wounded by a shell towards the close of the battle, near the right shoulder, and so badly, that he was forced to be carried off the field on a litter by six grenadiers. At Penaranda his arm was amputated.

(x) The Russian Ukase of the 19th of December, 1810, which destroyed the commercial relations of France with that empire; the admission of English commerce, contrary to treaty, into her ports; her armings, which, from the commencement of 1811, threatened the invasion of the duchy of Warsaw; and finally, the protest respecting Oldenburg, annihilated the treaty of alliance between France and Russia. It no longer existed when on both sides armies were forming for reciprocal observation. The whole of the year 1811, says the Duc de Bassano, the French minister for foreign affairs was, however spent in conference and negociations with Russia, in the hope of withdrawing, if possible, the cabinet of Petersburgh from the war, upon which it appeared to be resolved, and to obtain a knowledge of its real intentions. It is proved to the certainty of evidence, that that power proposed at the same time to depart from the conditions of the treaty of Tilsit, to place herself in peace with England, and to menace the existence of the duchy of Warsaw, making use of the pretext of indemnities claimed for the duke of Oldenburg.

Towards the close of 1811, six months after it was manifest in France that all this could end only in war, preparations were made for it. The garrison of Dantzic was increased to twenty thousand men. Stores of every description were conveyed to that place; and considerable sums of money were placed at the disposal of the department of engineers for the augmentation of its fortifications. The French army was placed on the war establishment. The cavalry, the train artillery, and the military baggage train, were completed. In March, 1812, a treaty of alliance was concluded between France and Austria, by which the latter was to furnish thirty thousand men; the preceding month a treaty had been concluded between France and Prussia.

In April the first corps of the French Grand Army marched for the Oder, the second corps to the Elbe, the third corps to the Lower Oder, the fourth corps set out from Verona, crossed the Tyrol, and proceeded to Silesia. The guards left Paris. On the 22d of April, the emperor of Russia took the command of his army, quitted St. Petersburgh, and moved his head quarters to Wilna.

In the commencement of May, the first corps arrived on the Vistula, at Elbing and Marienburg; the second corps at Marienwerder, the third corps at Thorn, the fourth and sixth corps at Plock, the fifth corps assembled at Warsaw, the eighth corps on the right of Warsaw, and the seventh corps at Pulawy. The French emperor set out from St. Cloud on the 9th of May; crossed the Rhine on the 13th, the Elbe on the 29th, and the Vistula on the 16th of June.

All the means of effecting an understanding between the two empires became impossible. The spirit which reigned in the Russian cabinet hurried it on to war.

General Narbonne, aid-de-camp to the French emperor, was dispatched to Wilna, and could remain there only a few days. By that was gained the proof, that the demand which had been made by prince Kurakin, and in which he declared, that he would not enter into any explanation before France had evacuated the territory of her own allies in order to leave them at the mercy of Russia, was the sine qua non of that cabinet.

The first corps advanced to the Pregel. The prince of Eckmuhl had his head-quarters, on the 11th of June, at Konigsberg.

The marshal duke of Reggio, commanding the second corps, had his head-quarters at Wehlau; the marshal duke of Elchingen, commanding the third corps, at Soldass; the prince Viceroy, at Rastenburg; the king of Westphalia, at Warsaw; the prince Poniatowski, at Pultusk. The French emperor moved his head-quarters, on the 12th, to Konigsberg, on the Pregel; on the 17th to Insterburg; and on the 19th to Gumbinnen.

A slight hope of accommodation still remained. The emperor had given orders to count Lauriston to wait on the emperor Alexander, or on his minister for foreign affairs, and to ascertain whether there might not yet be some means of obtaining a reconsideration of the demand of prince Kurakin, and of reconciling the honour of France, and the interest of her allies, with the opening a negociation.

The same spirit which had previously swayed the Russian cabinet upon various pretexts, prevented count Lauriston from accomplishing his mission; and it appeared, for the first time, that an ambassador, under circumstances of so much importance, was unable to obtain an interview, either with the sovereign or his minister. The secretary of Legation, Prevost, carried this intelligence to Gumbinnen; and the emperor issued orders to march, for the purpose of passing the Niemen. Napoleon then caused a proclamation to the soldiers to be inserted in the orders of the army; in which it is said, "At Tilsit, Russia swore eternal alliance with France, and war with England. She now violates her oaths. She refuses to give any explanation of her strange conduct, until the Eagles of France shall have repassed the Rhine, leaving, by such a movement, our allies at her mercy."

On the 23d of June, the king of Naples, who commands the cavalry, transferred his head-quarters to within two leagues of the Niemen, upon its left bank. The marshal prince of Eckmuhl, commanding the first corps, moved his head-quarters to the skirts of the great forest of Pilwisky. The second corps, and the Imperial guards, followed the line of march of the first corps. The third corps took the direction of Marienpol; the Viceroy, with the fourth and sixth corps, which remained in the rear, marched upon Kalwarry. The king of Westphalia proceeded to Novogorod, with the fifth, seventh, and eighth corps. The first Austrian corps, commanded by the prince of Schwartzenberg, quitted Lemberg, made a movement on its left, and drew near to Lublin. The pontoon train, under the orders of general Eble, arrived on the 23d, within two leagues of the Niemen. On the 23d, at two in the morning, the French emperor arrived at the advanced posts near Kowno, took a Polish cloak and cap from one of the light cavalry, and inspected the banks of the Niemen, accompanied by general Haxo, of the engineers, alone. On the 24th, the emperor proceeded to Kowno; but it would be unnecessary to mark the various movements of the army; therefore we shall only mention the most important places.

At this period the emperor of Russia was at Wilna, where he had been for some time with part of his court and guards, and one part of his army occupied Ronikontoni and Novtroki. The Russian general Bagawout, commanding the second corps, and a part of the Russian army, having been cut off from Wilna, had no other means of safety than by proceeding towards the Dwina (y). Several Cossack officers, and officers charged with dispatches, were captured by the French light cavalry.

On the 27th the French emperor arrived at the advanced posts, and put the army in motion for the purpose of approaching Wilna, and attacking the Russian army at day-break of the 28th, should it wish to defend Wilna, or retard its capture, in order to save the immense magazines which it had there. One Russian division occupied Troki, and another division was on the heights of Traka.

At day-break of the 28th, the king of Naples put himself in motion with the advanced guard, and the light cavalry of general count Bruyeres. The marshal prince of Eckmuhl supported him with his corps. The Russians every where retired. After exchanging some cannon-shot, they crossed the Wilia in haste, burned the wooden bridge of Wilna, and set fire to immense magazines, valued at many millions of rubles: more than one hundred and fifty thousand quintals of flour, an immense supply of forage and oats, and a great mass of articles of clothing, were burned. A great quantity of arms and warlike stores, was destroyed and thrown into the Wilia. At mid-day the French emperor entered Wilna. In the afternoon the bridge over the Wilia was re-established, and another constructed.

The division Bruyeres followed the enemy by the left bank. In a slight affair with their rear, about eighty carriages were taken from the Russians. The polish light-horse of the guard made a charge on the right bank of the Wilia, put to rout, pursued, and made prisoners, a considerable number of Cossacks.

On the 25th, the duke of Reggio crossed the Wilia; and next day he marched upon Javou, and on the 27th, on Chatoui. This movement obliged the prince of Wittgenstein, commandant of the first corps of the Russian army, to evacuate all Samogitia, and the country lying between Kowno and the sea; and to retire upon Wilkomir, after obtaining a reinforcement of two regiments of the guards.

On the 28th a rencounter took place opposite Develtovo. The Russians were driven from one position to another; and passed the bridge with so much precipitation, that they could not set fire to it. The Russians lost three hundred prisoners, among whom were several officers, and about one hundred killed or wounded. The French loss amounted to about fifty men.

The Russians then set fire to their grand magazine at Wilkomir; but a part of it fell into the hands of the French.

Hitherto the campaign had not been sanguinary; and in all the skirmishes the French did not make above one thousand prisoners. But the Russians lost the capital and the (y) The Niemen is navigable for vessels of two or three hundred tons, as far as Kowno. The communications by water are also secured as far as Dantzic, and with the Vistula, the Oder, and the Elbe. The Wilia, which flows by Wilna, is navigable for very small boats from Kowno to Wilna. Wilna, the capital of Lithuania, is also the chief town of all Polish Russia. Wilna contains from twenty-five to thirty thousand inhabitants, with a great number of convents and fine public buildings. About twenty-four hours after the Russians received intelligence that the French had passed the river at Kowno, the Russian court left the place.

greater

greater part of the Polish provinces. All the magazines of the first, second, and third lines, the result of two years' care, and valued at more than twenty millions of rubles, were consumed by the flames, except that part which fell into the power of the French. In fine, the head-quarters of the French army were now in the place where the Russian court had fixed its residence for six weeks.

In consequence of the destruction of the triple line of magazines, the emperor Alexander gave orders for the speedy establishment of magazines at Witepsk, Ostrow, Weliki-Louke, and Pskoff.

The Russian army, however, was posted and organized in an advantageous manner.

The first corps, commanded by prince Wittgenstein, consisted of eighteen thousand men, including artillery and sappers. The second corps, commanded by general Bagawout, consisted of the same numerical force. The third corps, commanded by general Schomaloff, amounted to twenty-four thousand men. The fourth corps, commanded by general Tutschkoff, consisted of eighteen thousand men. The Imperial guards were at Wilna. The sixth corps, commanded by general Doctorow, consisted of eighteen thousand men: this corps afterwards formed a part of the army of prince Bagrathion. The fifth corps was commanded by prince Bagrathion, and amounted to forty thousand men.

Notwithstanding this immense army of the Russians, the French continued to advance, and the Russians to retreat, destroying almost every thing in their way. The immense magazines which they had in Samogitia were burned by themselves, which occasioned an enormous loss, not only to their finances, but still more to the subsistence of the people.

The corps of Doctorow, however, viz. the sixth corps, was, till the 27th of June, without any orders, and had made no movement. On the 28th it assembled, and put itself in motion, in order to proceed to the Dwina. On the 30th, its advanced guard entered Soleinicki. It was charged by the light cavalry of general baron Borde Soult, and driven out of the village. Doctorow, perceiving that he was anticipated, turned to the right, and made for Ochmiana. General baron Pajol arrived at that place with his light cavalry, at the moment when Doctorow's vanguard entered it. General Pajol charged. The Russians were sabred and overthrown in the town.

General Doctorow, seeing his route intercepted, fell back upon Olchanoni. Marshal the prince of Eckmuhl, with a division of infantry, the cuirassiers of the division of count Valence, and the second regiment of light cavalry of the guard, moved upon Ochmiani, in order to support general Pajol.

The corps of Doctorow, thus cut off and driven towards the south, continued to prosecute the movement on the right by forced marches, with the sacrifice of its baggage, upon Smoroghoni, Danowcheff, and Robouilnicki, whence he made for the Dwina. This movement had been foreseen. General Nansouty, with a division of cuirassiers, the division of light cavalry of count Bruyeres, and count Moran's division of infantry, advanced to Mikailitchki, with a view to cut off this corps. He arrived on the 3d at Swin, at the time when it passed that place, and pushed it briskly. He took a large number of waggons, and obliged the Russians to abandon some hundreds of baggage carts. From these incessant skirmishes Doctorow's army suffered severely.

At this period torrents of rain fell during thirty-six hours, without intermission. The weather suddenly changed from extreme heat to very severe cold. Several thousands of horses perished by the effects of this sudden transition; and convoys of artillery were stopped by the mud. This terrible storm, which fatigued both men and beasts, retarded the march of the French army; and the corps of Doctorow, which successively fell in with the columns of general Borde Soult, of general Pajol, and general Nansouty, narrowly escaped destruction.

Prince Bagrathion marched towards the Dwina; and the king of Westphalia entered Grodno the same day. The Hetman Platoff was at Grodno with his Cossacks. When charged by the light cavalry of prince Poniatowski, the Cossacks were dispersed in every direction; and at that town the French found materials for one hundred thousand rations of bread, and some remains of the magazine.

On the 5th of July, general count Sebastiani arrived at Vidzoni, whence the emperor of Russia had departed on the preceding evening.

The general of brigade Roussel, with the ninth regiment of Polish light cavalry, and the second regiment of Prussian hussars, passed the Dziana on the same day, overthrew six Russian squadrons, sabred a great number, and took forty-five prisoners, with several officers; and general Nansouty took one hundred and thirty Russian mounted hussars and dragoons prisoners.

Marshal the prince of Eckmuhl entered Minsk on the 8th, and found there considerable magazines of flour, hay, clothing, &c. Prince Bagrathion had already arrived at Novoi-Sworgiew; and perceiving that he was anticipated, sent orders to burn the magazines; but he was too late, for the French under the prince of Eckmuhl had got possession of them.

The king of Westphalia was on the 9th at Novogrodek; general Reynier, at Konina: magazines, baggage waggons, quantities of medicines, and straggling parties continually fell into the hands of the French. The Russian divisions were straying in these countries without any previously arranged route, pursued on every side, losing their baggage, burning their magazines, destroying their artillery, and leaving their places defenceless.

General baron Colbert took, at Vileika, a magazine of three hundred quintals of flour, an hundred thousand rations of bread, &c. He found also at Vileika a chest containing two hundred thousand francs, in copper money.

Since the opening of the campaign, the French took from two thousand to two thousand five hundred Russian prisoners: their own loss was but trifling in comparison with that of the Russians.

Thus, ten days after opening the campaign, the advanced posts of the French were upon the Dwina. Almost the whole of Lithuania, containing four millions of inhabitants were conquered. The operations of the war commenced at the passage of the Vistula; and the French army by making forced marches from the period of passing that river, advanced upon the Dwina. The distance between the Vistula and the Dwina is greater than that between the Dwina and Mosiere, or Petersburgh.

The French emperor erected upon the right bank of the Wilia an entrenched camp, surrounded by redoubts; and constructed a citadel upon the mountain, on which was the ancient palace of the Jagellons.

On the 4th of July, marshal the duke of Tarentum set out from his head-quarters in Rossien, the capital of Samogitia, one of the finest and most fertile provinces in Poland; the general of brigade, baron Ricard, with a part of the seventh division, to march upon Poniewicz; where he arrived so suddenly, that the Russians had not time to destroy their magazines, which contained thirty thousand quintals of meal. He also took one hundred and sixty prisoners, among whom were four officers.

The march of the army from Kowno upon Wilna, and from Wilna upon Dunaburg and Minsk, obliged the Russians to abandon the banks of the Niemen, which the French immediately passed. When the prince of Eckmuhl seized upon the strong place of Borisow, upon the Beresina, sixty thousand pounds of powder, sixteen pieces of besieging artillery, and some hospitals, fell into his power. Considerable magazines were set on fire by the Russians, but a part was saved by the French.

On the 10th of July, general Latour Maubourg sent the division of light cavalry, commanded by general Rosnieki, in advance towards Mir. It met the Russian rear guard at a short distance from that town; when a very brisk engagement took place, and the Polish division remained master of the field. The general of Cossacks Gregoriow was killed, and one thousand five hundred Russians were killed and wounded. The loss of the French at the utmost, was not more than six hundred, in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The bodies of the Russian general of division count Pahlen, and of the Russian colonels Adronoff and Jesowayski were recognized on the field of battle.

The diet at Warsaw, being constituted into a general confederation of Poland, named prince Adam Czartorinski for its president. This prince, aged eighty years, had for fifty years been marshal of the diet of Poland. The first act of the diet was to declare the kingdom of Poland re-established. A deputation from the confederation was presented to the French emperor at Wilna, and submitted to his approbation and protection the act of confederation.

The prince of Schwartzenberg had his head-quarters on the 13th, at Prazana. On the 11th and 12th he occupied the important position of Pinsk, with a detachment, which took some men and considerable magazines.

On the 12th, general baron Pajol, who was at Ighoumen, sent sent captain Vandois with a part of the cavalry to Khaloui. This detachment took there a part of two hundred carriages, belonging to Bagrathion's corps, and made prisoners six officers, two hundred cannoniers, three hundred men attached to the train, and eight hundred fine artillery horses. Captain Vandois, finding himself fifteen leagues distant from the French army, did not think it practicable to carry off this convoy, and burnt it. He took with him, however, the horses and the prisoners.

On the 15th, general Grouchy sent a party on Star Lepel, which took considerable magazines, and two companies of miners, of eight officers, and two hundred men.

On the 18th, at two in the morning, general baron Colbert entered Orcha, where he took possession of immense magazines of flour, oats, and cloathing. He afterwards passed the Borysthenes, and proceeded in pursuit of a convoy of artillery.

Smolensk was now in alarm, and every thing was removing to Moscow. An officer, sent by the emperor Alexander to cause the evacuation of the magazines of Orcha, was quite astonished to find the place in the possession of the French. This officer was taken with his dispatches.

While Bagrathion was briskly pursued in his retreat, anticipated, separated, and removed from the main army,—that army, commanded by the emperor Alexander, retreated on the Dwina. On the 14th, general Sebastiani, following the rear-guard, killed five hundred Cossacks, and arrived at Drouia.

On the 13th, the duke of Reggio advanced upon Dunaburg, burnt the fine barracks which the Russians had constructed there, took a plan of the works, burnt some magazines, and took one hundred and fifty prisoners. After this diversion on the right, he moved on Drouia.

On the 15th, the Russians, who were concentrated in their entrenched camp of Drissa, to the number of from one hundred to one hundred and twenty thousand men,—being informed that the French light cavalry did not keep a strict watch, threw over a bridge, sent across five thousand infantry and five thousand cavalry, attacked general Sebastiani unexpectedly, drove him back one league, and caused him a loss of one hundred killed, wounded, and prisoners, among whom were a captain and a sub-lieutenant of the eleventh chasseurs. The general of brigade St. Genies, who was mortally wounded, remained in the power of the Russians.

On the 18th, the Russian army evacuated their entrenched camp of Drissa, defended by twelve palisadoed redoubts, united by a covered way, and extending three thousand toises on the river. These works were entirely destroyed by the French. The immense magazines they contained were either burnt or thrown into the water.

On the 19th, the emperor Alexander was at Witepsk.

On the 20th, the king of Naples passed the Dwina, and covered the right bank of the river with his cavalry. All the preparations the Russians had made to defend the passage of the Dwina, were useless. The magazines they had been forming for three years were entirely destroyed; the same happened to their works, which, according to the report of the people of the country, cost the Russians in one year not less than six thousand men.

In their movements, the Russians were obliged to destroy their baggage, and to throw their artillery and arms into the rivers. The Poles of the Russian army availed themselves of this precipitate retreat to desert; and waited in the woods till the arrival of the French. The number of Poles who deserted the Russian army, were calculated at twenty thousand men.

On the 20th, the prince of Eckmuhl advanced upon Mohilow; the garrison of which consisted of two thousand men, who defended it; but they were sabred by the light cavalry. The French now occupied Mohilow, Orcha, Disna, and Polotsk, and were advancing on Witepsk, where the Russian army was concentrated.

The emperor of Russia and the grand duke Constantine quitted the army, and repaired to the capital. On the 17th, the Russian army left the entrenched camp of Drissa, and marched towards Polotsk and Witepsk. The Russian army which was at Drissa consisted of five corps-d'armée, each of two divisions, and of four divisions of cavalry. One corps-d'armée, that of prince Wittgenstein, remained for the purpose of covering St. Petersburgh; the four other corps, having arrived on the 24th at Witepsk, crossed to the left bank of the Dwina. The corps of Ostermann, with a party of the cavalry of the guards, put itself in motion at day-break of the 25th, and marched upon Ostrovno.

On the 25th of July, general Nansouty, with the divisions Bruyeres and St. Germain, and the eighth regiment of light infantry, encountered the Russians two leagues in advance of Ostrovno. Several charges of cavalry took place; all of which were in favour of the French. The Russian cavalry, of which a part belonged to the guards, was overthrown. The batteries which the Russians opened upon the French cavalry were carried. The Russian infantry, who advanced to support their artillery, were broken and sabred by the French light cavalry.

On the 26th, the Viceroy marching with the division Delzon at the head of the columns, an obstinate action of the advanced guard, of from fifteen to twenty thousand men, took place a league beyond Ostrovno. The Russians were driven from their positions one after another; and the woods were carried by the bayonet (z).

On the 27th at day-break, the viceroy made the division Broussier file off in advance. The eighteenth regiment of light infantry, and brigade of light cavalry of the baron de Piré, wheeled to the right. The division Broussier marched by the great road, and repaired a small bridge which the Russians had destroyed. At day-break, the Russian rear-guard, consisting of ten thousand cavalry, was perceived drawn up en echellon on the plain; their right resting on the Dwina, and their left on a wood lined with infantry and artillery. General count Broussier took post on an eminence with the fifty-third regiment, waiting till the whole of his division had passed the defile. Two companies of voltigeurs had marched in advance, alone; they skirted the bank of the river, advancing towards that enormous mass of cavalry, which made a forward movement, and surrounded these two hundred men, who concentrated themselves with the greatest coolness, and remained during a whole hour hemmed in on all sides; they are said to have killed and wounded more than three hundred of the Russian horsemen. The division Delzon defiled on the right. The king of Naples directed the wood and the Russian batteries to be attacked. In less than an hour all the Russian positions were carried; and they were driven across the plain beyond a small river which enters the Dwina below Witepsk. The French army took a position on the banks of this river, at the distance of a league from the town. The Russians displayed in the plain fifteen thousand cavalry, and sixty thousand infantry. A battle was expected next day, the French emperor spent the remainder of the night in reconnoitring the field, and in making his dispositions for next day; but at day-break the Russian army was retreating in all directions towards Smolensk.

In these three actions of Ostrovno the French took ten pieces of cannon of Russian manufacture, (the cannoniers were sabred;) twenty caissons of ammunition; one thousand five hundred prisoners; five or six thousand Russians killed or wounded. The Russians had three generals killed or wounded. A considerable number of colonels and superior officers of their army remained on the field of battle.

On the 28th at day-break, the French entered Witepsk, a town containing thirty thousand inhabitants. It has twenty convents. The French found in it some magazines, particularly one of salt, valued at fifteen millions.

While the French army was marching on Witepsk, the prince of Eckmuhl was attacked at Mohilow. Bagrathion passed the Beresina at Bobruisk, and marched upon Novoibikow. At day-break on the 23d, three thousand Cossacks attacked the third regiment of chasseurs, and took one hundred of them, among whom were the colonel and four officers, all wounded. The generale was beat; an action commenced. The Russian general Sieverse, with two select divisions, began the attack. From eight in the morning till five in the afternoon, the firing was kept up on a strip of wood, and at a bridge which the Russians wished to force. At five, the prince of Eckmuhl caused three chosen battalions to advance, put himself at their head, overthrew the Russians, carried their positions, and pursued them for a league. The loss of the Russians is estimated at three thousand killed and wounded, and one thousand one hundred prisoners. The French lost seven hundred killed and wounded. Bagrathion repulsed, retired upon Bickow, where he passed the Borysthenes, to advance towards Smolensk.

(z) General Roussel, a brave soldier, after being the whole day at the head of the battalions, was visiting the advanced posts at ten at night, when a sentinel took him for an enemy, fired upon him, and the ball shattered his skull.

The

The heat at this time was excessive, greater than what it is in Italy. The thermometer was at twenty-six and twenty-seven degrees; even the nights were warm.

General Skamenskoi, with two divisions of the corps of Bagrathion, having been cut off from that corps, and not being able to rejoin it, entered Volhynia, effected a junction with the division of recruits commanded by general Tormasoff, and marched upon the seventh corps of the French army. He surprised and cut off the Saxon brigadier-general Klengel, who had under his command an advanced guard of two battalions, and two squadrons of prince Clement's regiment. After a resistance of six hours, the greater part of this advanced guard were killed or taken.

On the 19th, the Prussian general Grawert attacked the Russians at Eckau, in Courland, took two hundred prisoners, and killed a considerable number. When general Grawert had effected a junction with general Kleist, he drove the Russians before him on the road to Riga, and invested the tête-du-pont.

On the 20th, the Viceroy sent to Welij a brigade of Italian light cavalry: two hundred men charged four Russian battalions of the depôt, who were on their route to Twer, broke them, took four hundred prisoners, and one hundred waggons loaded with military stores.

On the 30th, the Aid-de-camp Traire, who had been sent forward with the Queen's regiment of dragoons of the Royal Italian guard, arrived at Ousvrath, took a captain and forty men prisoners, and obtained possession of two hundred carriages loaded with flour.

On the 1st of August, the Russians crossed the Drissa, and presented themselves in battle array in front of the second corps. The duke of Reggio allowed half their corps to cross, and as soon as he perceived about fifteen thousand men and fourteen pieces of cannon over, he unmasked a battery of forty pieces of cannon, which played upon them with grape-shot for nearly an hour. At the same time the divisions Legrand and Verdier made a running charge with the bayonet, and drove the greater part of the Russians into the river. All their artillery and military chests were taken, three thousand prisoners, among whom were several officers, and one of general Wittgenstein's staff, together with three thousand five hundred men killed or wounded, are the result of this affair.

The emperor of Russia had ordered levies of men in the two governments of Witepsk and Mohilow; but before his ukases could reach those provinces, the French were masters of them.

General Ricard, with his brigade, entered Dunaburg on the 1st of August; where he found twenty pieces of cannon; all the remainder having been taken away. The duke of Tarentum also arrived there on the 2d. Thus Dunaburg, which the Russians had been fortifying for five years, where they had expended several millions, which cost them more than twenty thousand men during the labour, was abandoned without firing a musket (a).

On the 8th of August, twelve thousand of the Russian cavalry marched upon Inkovo, and attacked general count Sebastiani's division, which for half a league was obliged to fight, retreating all the way, suffering and causing equal loss to the Russians. A company of voltigueurs, of the twenty-fourth regiment of light infantry, forming part of a battalion of that regiment, which had been confided to the cavalry, to maintain a position in a wood, was taken. The French had about two hundred killed and wounded; the loss of the Russians was not so great.

On the 14th, at break of day, general Grouchy marched upon Leacbri, chased two regiments of Cossacks from it, and there found the corps of general count Nansouty. The same day the king of Naples, supported by the duke of Elchingen, arrived at Krasnoi. The twenty-seventh Russian division, consisting of five thousand infantry, supported by two thousand cavalry, and twelve pieces of cannon, was in a position before that town: it was attacked and forced by the duke of Elchingen. The twenty-fourth regiment of light infantry attacked the small town of Krasnoi with the bayonet, with great intrepidity. The taking of eight pieces of cannon, fourteen caissons, one thousand five hundred prisoners, with a field covered with more than one thousand Russians, were the result of the battle of Krasnoi, in which the Russian division, consisting of five thousand men, suffered a loss of nearly half its number.

On the 16th, in the morning, the heights of Smolensk were commanded by the French. The town presented to their view an enclosure of walls of four thousand toises, ten feet thick, and twenty-five feet high, intersected with towers, several of which were armed with cannon of a heavy calibre. The French emperor reconnoitred the town, and placed his army in its position on the same day. Marshal the duke of Elchingen had the left leaning on Borysthenes, the prince of Eckmuhl the centre, prince Poniatowski the right; the guards were placed in reserve in the centre, the viceroy in reserve on the right, and the cavalry under the orders of the king of Naples, at the extremity of the right; the duke of Abrantes, with the eighth corps, lost his way, and made a false movement. The 16th, and half of the 17th, was passed in observation. A fire of musketry was kept up along the line. The Russians occupied Smolensk with thirty thousand men, and the remainder of their army was formed upon the fine positions upon the right bank of the river, opposite the town, and communicating by three bridges. Smolensk is considered as a strong town by the Russians, and the bulwark of Moscow. On the 17th, at two in the afternoon, seeing that the Russians had not debouched, that they were fortifying themselves in Smolensk, the French emperor marched upon the right, and ordered prince Poniatowski to change his front, the right in advance, and to place his right to the Borysthenes, occupying one of the suburbs by posts and batteries, to destroy the bridge, and intercept the communication of the town with the right bank. During this time, the prince of Eckmuhl received orders to attack two of the suburbs which the Russians had intrenched, two hundred toises distant from the town; and which were each defended by seven or eight thousand men, and heavy cannon. At two in the afternoon, count Bruyeres' division of cavalry, having driven away the Cossacks and Russian cavalry, approached the bridge highest up the river, a battery of ten pieces of artillery established upon this ground, opened a fire of grape-shot upon that part of the Russian army which was upon the right bank of the river, and quickly obliged the Russian masses of infantry to evacuate that position. The Russians then placed two batteries of twenty pieces of cannon in a convent, to annoy the battery which played upon the bridge. At three, the cannonade commenced. At half past four a very brisk fire of musketry began; and at five, the divisions of Morand and Gudin carried the Russian entrenched suburbs, and pursued them to the covered-way, which was covered with Russian dead. The duke of Elchingen attacked the position which the Russians had without the town, seized upon it, and pursued them to the glacis. At five o'clock, the communication of the town with the right bank became difficult, and could only be accomplished by isolated men. Three batteries of breaching twelve pounders were placed against the walls at six in the evening; one by Friant's division, and the two others by Morand's and Gudin's divisions. The Russians were driven from all the towers by howitzers, which played upon them.

The general of artillery, count Sorbier, rendered the occupation of the covered way by the Russians impossible, by two enfilading batteries. The battle continued the whole night; three breaching batteries played with the utmost activity: two companies of miners were attached to the ramparts. The town was now on fire in several places; and an hour after midnight, the Russians abandoned the town, and retired across the river. At two o'clock, the grenadiers who first led to the attack no longer found resistance, the place was evacuated; two hundred pieces of cannon, and one of the first towns in Russia were in the power of the French, and that too in sight of the whole Russian army.

The combat of Smolensk, which we might justly term a battle, an hundred thousand men having been engaged on the different sides, caused the Russians a loss of four thousand seven hundred men, left dead on the field; of two thousand prisoners, the greater part of whom were wounded; and of seven to eight thousand wounded. Amongst the dead were found five Russian generals. The French loss amounted to nine hundred killed, and three thousand two hundred wounded. The general of brigade, Grabouski,

(a) In consequence of the taking of Dunaburg, Napoleon ordered, that a park of one hundred pieces of artillery, which he had formed at Magdeburg, and which had advanced upon the Niemen, should retrograde to Dantzic, and be put in depôt in that place. At the commencement of the campaign, two besieging parks of artillery had been prepared; one against Dunaburg, the other against Riga.

was killed, and the generals of brigade, Grandeau and Dalton, wounded.

The French did not succeed in quenching the fire which consumed the town, until the 19th, the French sappers having worked with great activity. The houses in the city were filled with Russians dead and dying (b).

After the battle of Drissa, the duke of Reggio, knowing that general Wittgenstein, had been reinforced by twelve third battalions from the garrison of Dunaburg, and willing to draw him to an engagement near the defile below Polotsk, caused the second and sixth corps to be ranged in order of battle below Polotsk. General Wittgenstein followed him, attacked him on the 16th and 17th, and was repulsed. At the moment when the duke of Reggio was making his dispositions to profit by the victory, and to close the Russians in the defile, he was struck on the shoulder by a biscayan (c). General Gouvion St. Cyr took the command of the second and sixth corps. On the 17th, in the evening, the Russians retired through the defile. General Verdier was wounded. General Maison succeeded him in the command of his division. The loss of the French was estimated at one thousand men killed and wounded. The loss of the Russians to two thousand five hundred. The French took five hundred prisoners.

On the 18th, at four o'clock in the afternoon, general Gouvion St. Cyr, commanding the second and sixth corps, opened the Russians, by causing their right wing to be attacked by the Bavarian division of the count de Wrede. The battle extended the whole length of the line, and the Russians were thrown into confusion, and pursued for two leagues, as long as day-light permitted; twenty pieces of cannon, and one thousand prisoners, remained in the power of the French army. The Bavarian general, Deroy, was wounded.

On the 19th, at break of day, the bridge being finished, the marshal duke of Elchingen crossed over to the right bank of the Borysthenes, and pursued the Russians. At one league from the town he encountered the last column of the Russian rear-guard. It was a division of five or six thousand men stationed on fine heights. He caused them to be attacked with the bayonet by the fourth regiment of infantry of the line, and by the seventy-second ditto. The position was carried; and three or four hundred prisoners fell into the hands of the French. The flying Russians retired on the second column, which was posted on the heights of Valentina. The first position was carried by the tenth of the line, and towards four o'clock in the afternoon, the musketry fire was kept up against the whole of their rear-guard, which presented about fifteen thousand men. The duke of Abrantes had passed the Borysthenes at two o'clock, to the right of Smolensk, and he found himself close upon the rear of the Russians. Four divisions then advanced to support their rear-guard, and, among others, the divisions of grenadiers, which until now had not come forward; five or six thousand cavalry formed their right, whilst their left was covered by woods, filled with tirailleurs. It was of the greatest consequence to them to keep this position as long as possible, it being a very fine one. The French on their part attached no less importance to it, in order to accelerate the retreat of the Russians, and cause all the carriages filled with wounded and other articles to be abandoned, which were protected by the rear-guard. This was what gave rise to the battle of Valentina, one of the finest feats of arms in military history. At six o'clock in the evening, the division of Gudin pushed forward a column on the centre of the Russian of position, which after an hour's combat, was forced. General count Gudin was mortally wounded. General Girard took the command of the division. The Russians, after this battle, precipitated their retreat in such a manner, that on the day of the 20th, the French troops marched twenty leagues, without being able to find the Cossacks, and every where picking up the wounded and the stragglers.

The loss of the French in the battle of Valentina was seven hundred killed, and two thousand six hundred wounded. That of the Russians was upwards of one thousand five hundred: the French took one thousand prisoners, mostly wounded.

Thus the only two divisions of the Russian army, which had not suffered by the preceding combats of Mohilow, Ostrovno, Krasnoi, and Smolensk, now suffered by the battle of Valentina (d).

General count Caulincourt entered Viasma on the 29th of August, at day-break. The Russians had burned the bridges, and set fire to several quarters of the city. Viasma is a town of fifteen thousand inhabitants: there are four thousand burghers, merchants, and artizans; there are thirty-two churches. Considerable resources in flour, soap, drugs, &c. and large magazines of brandy, were found by the French. The Russians burnt the magazines; and the finest houses in the town were on fire when the French arrived. Two battalions of the 25th were employed with much activity in extinguishing them. It was got under, and saved three quarters of the town. The Cossacks before they left it committed the most dreadful pillages. All the population of the towns retired upon Moscow.

The French head-quarters were, on the 1st and 2d of September, at Ghjat (e). The Russians set fire to Ghjat, as well as to the other places which they abandoned; but the French entered in time to extinguish it. The French army rested on the 2d and 3d in the vicinity of Ghjat, and threw six bridges over that river.

On the morning of the 5th, the French army was in motion, and in the afternoon, they perceived the Russians formed with their right upon the Moskwa, the left upon the heights on the left bank of the Kologha. At one thousand two hundred toises in advance of the left, the Russians had begun to fortify a fine height, between two woods, where they had placed nine or ten thousand men. The French emperor, having reconnoitred it, resolved to carry this position. Two hours afterwards the attack commenced. In one hour the redoubt was carried, with the cannon; the Russian corps driven from the wood, and put to flight, leaving nearly the fourth part of their men on the field of battle. At seven in the evening the firing ceased.

On the 6th, the day was passed in reconnoitring. The position of the Russians was exceedingly strong. The Russians were estimated at one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty thousand men, and the army of the French consisted of about the same number.

On the morning of the 7th, prince Poniatowski put himself in motion to turn the forest on which the Russians rested their left. The prince of Eckmuhl marched on the skirt of the forest. Two batteries of sixty cannon each, commanding the enemy's position, had been constructed in the night. At six o'clock, general count Sorbier, who had the armed battery on the right with the artillery of the reserve of the guard, commenced the fire. General Pernetty, with thirty pieces of cannon, skirted the wood, turning the head of the Russian position. At half-past six, general Compans was wounded; at seven, the prince of Eckmuhl had his horse killed. The attack advanced: the musketry commenced. The viceroy, who formed the French left, attacked and carried the village of Borodino. At seven, the marshal duke of Elchingen put himself in motion, and, under the protection of sixty pieces of cannon, bore upon the centre. A thousand pieces of cannon spread death on all sides. At eight o'clock, the Russian positions were carried, their redoubts taken, and the French artillery crowned his heights. The advantage of position, which the Russian batteries had enjoyed for two hours, now belonged to the French. A part of the Russian artillery was taken; the rest were withdrawn to their lines in the rear. In this extremity they attempted to restore the combat, and to attack those strong positions which had fallen into the hands of the French. Three hundred pieces of French cannon placed on these heights,

(b) Of twelve divisions, which composed the grand Russian army, two divisions were broken and defeated in the combats of Ostrovno, two met with the same fate in the battle of Mohilow, and six in the battle of Smolensk.

(c) A small piece of field-ordnance, probably so called from having been first used in the mountainous province of Biscay.

(d) It is curious to observe, that in the midst of all these disasters, the Russians never ceased to chant Te Deums; they converted every thing into a victory; but, in spite of the ignorance and brutality of these people, even this began to appear ridiculous to them, and their eyes, by the advance of the French army, began now to be opened.

(e) The Ghjat river empties itself into the Wolga, and is navigable to the Caspian Sea. The city of Ghjat contains a population of eight or ten thousand souls. Many of the houses are built of stone and brick. There are many parish churches, and several manufactories of linen cloth. Agriculture has made great progress in this country within the last forty years. It no longer bears any resemblance to the descriptions which are given of it. Potatoes, pulse, and cabbages, grow there in abundance; and the granaries are generally full.

thundered

thundered upon their masses, and their soldiers died at the foot of those parapets which they had raised with so much labour as a protecting shelter.

The Russians still held their redoubts to the right. General count Morand marched thither, and carried them; but at nine in the morning, attacked on all sides, he was obliged to give way. The Russians attacked the French centre, and for a moment it was feared that they might carry the village which was burnt; the division Friant advanced thither: eighty pieces of French cannon immediately arrested the enemy's columns, which stood for two hours in close order, under the chain shot, not daring to advance, and unwilling to retire. The king of Naples decided their uncertainty. He caused the fourth corps of cavalry to make a charge, who penetrated through the breaches which the cannon-shot had made in the condensed masses of the Russians, and the squadrons of their cuirassiers; they dispersed on all sides. The general of division count Caulincourt advanced at the head of the fifth regiment of cuirassiers, and entered the redoubt on the left by its gorge. From this moment there was no longer any uncertainty. He turned upon the Russians the twenty-one pieces of cannon which were found in the redoubt. Count Caulincourt was killed by a cannon-ball. It was now two in the afternoon; the Russians had lost all hope; the battle was ended; but the cannonade still continued; the Russians now fought for retreat and safety, but no longer for victory. The loss of the Russians was enormous; from twelve to thirteen thousand men, and from eight to nine thousand Russian horses, were counted on the field of battle: sixty pieces of cannon and five thousand prisoners were taken by the French; whose loss was estimated at ten thousand men in killed and wounded; that of the Russians was calculated at forty thousand. Forty Russian generals were killed, wounded, or taken. General Bagrathion was wounded. The French general of division Montbrun, was killed by a cannon-ball; general count Caulincourt, who was sent to occupy his place, was killed by a shot of the same kind, an hour afterwards. The French generals of brigade Compere, Plauzonne, Marion, and Huart, were killed; seven or eight generals were wounded, the most of them slightly.

Such is a sketch of the battle of Moskwa, fought a few leagues in the rear of Mojaisk, and twenty-five leagues from Moscow, near the little river Moskwa. The French fired sixty thousand cannon shot.

After the battle of the Moskwa the French army pursued the Russians upon Moscow, by the three routs of Mojaisk, Svenigorod, and Kalouga; and on the 14th of September at mid-day, the French entered Moscow.

The city of Moscow is as large as Paris; it is an extremely rich city, full of palaces of all the nobles of the empire. The Russian governor, Rostopchin, wished to ruin this fine city when he saw it abandoned by the Russian army. He armed three thousand malefactors whom he had taken from the dungeons; he also summoned six thousand satellites, and distributed arms among them from the arsenal.

The French advanced guard, arrived in the centre of the city, was received by a fire of musketry, which issued from the Kremlin. The king of Naples ordered a battery of a few pieces of cannon to be opened, and soon took possession of the Kremlin.

The French emperor took up his abode in the Kremlin, which is in the centre of the city, like a kind of citadel, surrounded by high walls. Thirty thousand wounded or sick Russians were in the hospitals, abandoned, without succour, and without nourishment.

Moscow is the entrepôt of Asia and of Europe. Its warehouses were immense; every house was provided for eight months with necessaries of every description. It was only the evening before, and the day of the entrance of the French, that the danger became known. Moscow, one of the finest and richest cities in the world, is no more. On the 14th, the Russians set fire to the exchange, to the Bazar, and the hospital. On the 16th, a violent wind arose. Three or four hundred ruffians set fire to the city in five hundred different places at the same moment, by order of the governor Rostopchin. Five-sixths of the houses were built of wood; the fire spread with a prodigious rapidity; it was an ocean of flame. Churches, of which there were one thousand six hundred, above one thousand palaces, immense magazines; nearly all fell a prey to the flames. The Kremlin was preserved. The loss is incalculable for Russia, for her commerce, and for her nobility, who had left all there. The French bulletin says, it is not over-rating its value to state it at many milliards. About one hundred of these incendiaries were apprehended by the French and shot; all of them declared that they acted under the orders of Rostopchin, and the director of the police. Thirty thousand sick and wounded Russians were burnt. The richest commercial houses in Russia were ruined. The clothing, the magazines, and the equipments of the Russian army were consumed. They have thus lost every thing: they would remove nothing, because they thought it impossible for the French to reach Moscow. When they saw all in the hands of the French, they conceived the horrible project of destroying by fire this first capital, the centre of the empire; and they reduced to beggary two hundred thousand respectable inhabitants. The inhabitants endeavoured to stop the progress of the flames; but the governor had taken the horrid precaution to carry off or destroy all the engines.

In the twenty-first French bulletin it is said, "Three hundred incendiaries have been arrested and shot; they were provided with fuses six inches long, which they had between two pieces of wood: they had also squibs, which they threw upon the roofs of the houses. The wretch Rastopchin had these prepared, on pretence that he wished to send a balloon, full of combustible matter, amidst the French army. He thus got together the squibs and other materials, necessary for the execution of his project.

The fires subsided on the 19th and 23th; three quarters of the city were burned; among other palaces that beautiful one of Catharine, which had been newly finished: not above a quarter of the houses remained.

While Rostopchin was taking away the fire-engines of the city, he left behind him sixty thousand muskets, one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, more than six hundred thousand balls and shells, one million five hundred thousand cartridges, four hundred thousand pounds of gunpowder, four hundred thousand pounds of saltpetre and sulphur. It was not till the 19th, that the powder, saltpetre, and sulphur were discovered at a fine establishment, half a league from the city by the French, who every day discovered cellars full of wine and brandy. Manufactures were beginning to flourish at Moscow: they were destroyed. The conflagration of this capital will throw Russia one hundred years back.

The colours taken by the Russians from the Turks in different wars, and several curious things found in the Kremlin, were sent off for Paris. The French found a Madonna enriched with diamonds; which they also sent to Paris.

In the 24th bulletin, dated October 14, it is said, the engineers have taken a plan of the city of Moskow, in which those houses are marked which were saved from the flames. It results, that we did not succeed in saving more than the tenth part of the town; the other nine-tenths exist no longer.

All the sick belonging to the French, who were in the hospitals of Moscow, left them on the 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th of October, for Mojaisk and Smolensk. The artillery caissons, the ammunition taken; a great quantity of curious things, and two trophies, were packed up and sent off on the 15th. The French army received orders to bake biscuit for twenty days, and hold itself in readiness to march: in effect, the French emperor left Moscow on the 19th. The head quarters were the same day at Disna. On the one side, the Kremlin has been armed and fortified, and at the same time it has been mined, in order to blow it up.

The Russian Cossacks appeared in great numbers, and the French cavalry; the advanced guard of cavalry placed in advance of Veukovo, were surprised by a horde of Cossacks, who were in the camp, before they could mount on horseback. They took part of general Sebastiani's park of artillery, one hundred baggage waggons, and made about one hundred prisoners.

Marshal the duke of Treviso remained at Moscow with a garrison.

After Moscow had ceased to exist, the French emperor determined either to abandon this heap of ruins, or only occupy the Kremlin with three thousand men; but the Kremlin, after fifteen days' labour, was not judged sufficiently strong to be abandoned for twenty or thirty days to its own forces. It would have weakened and incommoded the army in its movements, without giving a great advantage. Twenty thousand men would have been necessary to protect Moscow from the beggars and plunderers.

Moscow

Moscow is, at present, a truly unhealthy and impure sink. A population of two hundred thousand wandering in the neighbouring woods, dying with hunger, came to these ruins to seek what remains, and vegetables in the gardens to support life. It appeared useless to compromise any thing whatever for an object which was of no military value, and which has now become of no political importance. All the magazines which were in the city having been carefully examined, and the others emptied, the French emperor caused the Kremlin to be mined. The duke of Treviso caused it to be blown up at two o'clock a. m. on the 23d: the arsenal, barracks, magazines—all were destroyed. This ancient citadel, which takes its date from the foundation of the monarchy—this first palace of the Czars, has been destroyed! The duke of Treviso has marched for Vereia. The emperor of Russia's aid-de-camp, baron Winzingerode, having, on the 22d, attempted to penetrate at the head of five hundred Cossacks, was repulsed and taken prisoner, with a young Russian officer named Nareskin. On the 19th, the head-quarters were in the castle of Troitskoi: they remained there on the 20th. On the 21st they were at Ignatien; the 22d at Pominskoi, all the army having made two flank marches; and the 23d at Borowsk.

On the 27th of October, prince Poniatowski marched upon Vereia. On the 23d, the French army was about to follow this movement; but, in the afternoon, they learnt that the Russians had quitted their entrenched camp, and were on march to the little town of Maloyaroslavitz. The viceroy received orders to march. Delzon's division arrived on the 23d, at six in the evening, on the left bank; took possession of the bridge, and caused it to be repaired. In the night between the 23d and 24th, the Russian division arrived in the town, and took possession of the heights on the right bank, which are extremely advantageous. On the 24th, at day-break, the battle commenced. During this time, the Russian army appeared quite entire, and took a position behind the town. The divisions Delzon, Broussier, and Pino, and the Italian guard, were successively engaged. Two-thirds of the Russian army were engaged to maintain this position; but this was in vain, for the town was taken, as well as the heights. The Russians retreated so precipitately, that they were obliged to throw twenty pieces of cannon into the river. Towards night, the marshal prince of Eckmuhl debouched with his corps, and all the army was in order of battle, with its artillery, on the 25th, in the position which the Russians occupied the night before.

The French emperor moved his head-quarters on the 24th to the village of Ghorodnia. At seven in the morning, six thousand Cossacks, who had slipped into the wood, made a general huzza in the rear of his position, and took six pieces of cannon, which were parked. The duke of Istria set off at a gallop with all the horse guards. This horde was sabred; the artillery it had taken was recovered, and several of his waggons were captured; six hundred of these Cossacks were killed, wounded, or taken; thirty men of the guards were wounded and three killed. The general of division, count Rapp, had a horse killed under him.

The emperor marched to Maloyaroslavitz, reconnoitred the position of the Russians, and ordered an attack next morning; but in the night they retreated. The French emperor then directed the movement upon Vareia. On the 26th, head-quarters were at Borowsk, and on the 27th at Vereia.

In the battle of Maloyaroslavitz, general baron Delzon, a distinguished officer, was killed with three balls. The French loss was one thousand five hundred men killed or wounded; that of the Russians five or six thousand. The French found on the field of battle one thousand seven hundred Russians, amongst whom were one thousand one hundred recruits, dressed in grey jackets, having hardly served two months. The Russians had three generals killed; and general count Pino was slightly wounded.

The French imperial head-quarters were, on the 1st of November, at Viasma, and on the 9th at Smolensk. The weather was very fine up to the 6th, but on the 7th winter began. The ground was covered with snow. The roads became very slippery, and very difficult for carriage horses. The French lost many men by cold and fatigne; night bivouakings (f) were very injurious to them.

Since the battle of Maloyaroslavitz, the advanced guard of the French saw no other enemy than the Cossacks, who, like the Arabs, pour upon the flanks, and fly about to annoy.

On the 2d, at two in the afternoon, twelve thousand Russian infantry, covered by a cloud of Cossacks, intercepted the communication, a league's distance from Viasma, between the prince of Eckmuhl and the viceroy. The prince of Eckmuhl and the viceroy marched upon this column, drove it from the road, and overthrew it in the wood; took a major general with a good number of prisoners, and carried off six pieces of cannon.

Since the bad weather, from the 6th to the 11th, the French lost more than three thousand carriage horses, and nearly one hundred caissons were destroyed.

The cold weather began on the 7th; from that moment the French lost every night several hundred horses, in consequence of bivouaking. Arrived at Smolensk, the French had already lost many cavalry and artillery horses.

The cold suddenly increased; and on the 14th, 15th, and 16th of November, the thermometer was at sixteen and eighteen degrees below the freezing point. The roads were covered with ice; the cavalry, artillery, and baggage horses, perished every night, not only by hundreds, but by thousands, particularly the German and French horses. In a few days, more than thirty thousand horses perished; the French cavalry were on foot; the artillery and baggage were without conveyance. It was necessary to abandon and destroy a good part of the cannon, ammunition, and provisions.

This army, so fine on the 6th, was very different on the 14th,—almost without cavalry, without artillery, without transports. "Without cavalry, (says the twenty-ninth French bulletin, dated December 3,) we could not reconnoitre a quarter of a league's distance; without artillery, we could not risk a battle, and firmly await it: it was requisite to march, in order not to be constrained to a battle, which the want of ammunition prevented us from desiring; it was requisite to occupy a certain space, not to be turned, and that too without cavalry, which led and connected the columns. This difficulty, joined to a cold which suddenly came on, rendered our situation miserable. Those men, whom nature had not sufficiently steeled to be above all the chances of fate and fortune, appeared shook, lost their gaiety, their good humour, and dreamed but of misfortunes and catastrophes; those whom she has created superior to every thing, preserved their gaiety, and their ordinary manners, and saw fresh glory in the different difficulties to be surmounted.

"The enemy, who saw upon the roads traces of that frightful calamity which had overtaken the French army, endeavoured to take advantage of it. He surrounded all the columns with his Cossacks, who carried off, like the Arabs of the desert, the trains and carriages which separated. This contemptible cavalry, which only make noise, and are not capable of penetrating through a company of voltigueurs, rendered themselves formidable by favour of circumstances. Nevertheless, the enemy had to repent of all the serious attempts which he wished to undertake: they were overthrown by the viceroy, before whom they were placed, and lost many men.

"The duke of Elchingen, with three thousand men, had blown up the ramparts of Smolensk: he was surrounded, and found himself in a critical position, but he extricated himself from it with that intrepidity by which he is distinguished. After having kept the enemy at a distance from him during the whole of the 18th, and constantly repulsed him, at night, he made a movement on the right, passed the Borysthenes, and deceived all the calculations of the enemy. On the 19th, the army passed the Borysthenes at Orza; and the Russian army being fatigued, and having lost a great number of men, ceased from its attempts.

"The army of Volhynia had inclined, on the 16th, upon Minsk, and marched upon Borisow. General Dombrowski defended the bridge-head of Borisow with three thousand men. On the 23d, he was forced, and obliged to evacuate this position. The enemy then passed the Beresina, marching upon Bobr; the division Lambert formed the advanced guard.

"The second corps, commanded by the duke of Reggio, which was at Tancherein, had received orders to march upon Borisow, to secure to the army the passage of the Beresina. On the 24th, the duke of Reggio met the division Lambert, four leagues from Borisow, attacked and defeated it, took two thousand prisoners, six pieces of cannon, (f) These are extraordinary night-guards for the security of a camp or army.

cannon, five hundred bággage waggons of the army of Volhynia, and threw the enemy on the right bank of the Beresina.

" On the 26th, at break of day, the emperor, after having deceived the enemy by different movements made during the day of the 25th, marched upon the village of Studzeanea, and caused, in spite of an enemy's division, and in its presence, two bridges to be thrown over the river. The duke of Reggio passed, attacked the enemy, and led him, fighting, two hours. The enemy retired upon the tête-du-pont of Borisow. General Legrand, an officer of the first-rate merit, was badly, but not dangerously, wounded. During the whole of the 26th and 27th, the army passed.

" The duke of Belluno, commanding the ninth corps, had received orders to follow the movement of the duke of Reggio, to form the rear guard, and keep in check the Russian army from the Dwina, which followed him. Partonneaux's division formed the rear-guard of this corps.

" On the 27th, at noon, the duke of Belluno arrived with two divisions at the bridge of Studzeanea. Partonneaux's division set out at night for Borisow. A brigade of this division, which formed the rear-guard, and which was charged with burning the bridge, marched at seven in the evening, and arrived between ten and eleven o'clock; it sought its first brigade and its general, who had departed two hours before, and which it had not met with in its route. Its researches were in vain; some uneasiness was then conceived. All we have since been able to learn is, that the first brigade set out at five o'clock, missed its way at six, went to the right in place of proceeding to the left, and marched two or three leagues in this direction; that, during the night, and benumbed with cold, it rallied at seeing the enemy's fires, which it mistook for those of the French army. Thus surrounded, it was taken. This cruel mistake must have caused us a loss of two thousand infantry, three hundred cavalry, and three pieces of artillery.

" All the army having passed, on the morning of the 28th the duke of Belluno guarded the tête-du-pont upon the left bank: the duke of Reggio, and behind him all the the army, was upon the right bank. Borisow having been evacuated, the armies of the Dwina and Volhynia communicated; they planned an attack on the 28th, at break of day. The duke of Reggio caused the emperor to be informed that he was attacked. Half an hour afterwards, the duke of Belluno was on the left bank. The duke of Elchingen immediately followed the duke of Reggio, and the duke of Treviso followed the duke of Elchingen. The battle became warm. The enemy wishing to turn our right, general Doumere ordered a charge of cavalry at the moment when the legion of the Vistula was engaged in the woods, to pierce the centre of the enemy. The enemy was defeated and put to the rout, together with his cavalry, which came to the assistance of his infantry. Six thousand prisoners, two standards, and six pieces of cannon fell into our hands. On his side, the duke of Belluno vigorously charged the enemy, defeated him, took from five to six hundred prisoners, and did not suffer him to advance within reach of the cannon of the bridge. General Fournier made a fine charge of cavalry.

" In the battle of the Beresina, the army of Volhynia suffered much. The duke of Reggio was wounded, but his wound was not dangerous. He received a ball in his side.

" The next day (the 29th) we remained on the field of battle. We had to make our choice between two routes—that to Minsk, and that to Wilna. The road to Wilna led through a very fine country. The army being without cavalry, deficient in ammunition, and horribly fatigued by fifty days' march, carrying in its train all the sick and wounded of so many battles, stood greatly in need of getting to its magazines.

" On the 30th, the head quarters were at Plechnitsi; on the 1st of December at Slaike; and on the 3rd, at Molodetschno, where the army received the first convoys from Wilna. All the wounded officers and soldiers, and whatever else could be of embarrassment, with the baggage, &c. were sent off to Wilna."

The generals, officers, and soldiers, suffered greatly from want. Numbers lost their baggage by the loss of their horses, and several by the effects of the cossacks' ambushes. The cossacks took numbers of insolated persons, of geographical engineers, who were taking positions, and of wounded officers, who were marching without precaution, preferring running the risk, to marching slowly, and going with the convoy.

In all these movements the French emperor continually marched in the middle of his guards—the cavalry commanded by the duke of Istria, and the infantry commanded by the duke of Dantzic. The prince of Neufchatel, the grand marshal, the grand equerry, and all the aides-de-camp and military officers of the household, always accompanied his majesty. Our cavalry was dismounted to such a degree, that it was necessary to collect the officers, who had still a horse remaining, in order to form four companies of one hundred and fifty men each. The generals there performed the functions of captains, and the colonels those of subalterns. This sacred squadron, commanded by general Grouchy, and under the orders of the king of Naples, did not lose sight of the emperor in all these movements.

On the 5th of December, the French emperor, having called together at his head quarters at Smorgonie, the viceroy, the prince of Neufchatel, and the marshals dukes of Elchingen, Dantzic, Treviso, the prince of Eckmuhl, the duke of Istria, acquainted them, that he had nominated the king of Naples his lieutenant-general, to command the army during the rigorous season. Napoleon, in passing through Wilna, was employed several hours with the duke of Bassano. He travelled incognito, in a single sledge, with and under the name of the duke of Vicenza. He examined the fortifications of Praga, surveyed Warsaw, and remained there several hours unknown. Two hours before his departure he sent for count Potocki, and the minister of finance of the grand duchy, with whom he had a long conference. He arrived on the 14th, at one o'clock in the morning, at Dresden; and on the 18th, at half after eleven o'clock at night he arrived at Paris.

Thus have we given as clear an account of the war in Russia as seemed consistent with truth, and at the close of it, which is taken from the twenty-ninth bulletin, a series of the greatest hardships, the severest privations, and the most dreadful sufferings, was experienced by the French army. Various reports of the death or insanity of the French emperor had been circulated, but the arrival of this bulletin put a final stop to the absurd speculations which had been formed upon those suppositions. He arrived safely at Paris, in good health, and immediately proceeded to business. The wretched remains of his army he quitted at Smorgonie, a town about 50 miles from Wilna, but it does not appear that he left it before it had reached a place of comparative safety. So intense indeed was the cold which destroyed the French army, that at Copenhagen, on the 19th of December, Reaumur's thermometer was 13 degrees below Zero, and at Wilna it was 25 degrees below the same point. From the custom-house at Copenhagen to the coast of Sweden, the Sound presented one continued surface of ice; and it was said, that if the frost should continue but a few days longer it would soon be passable on foot. Some of the Danish ships, which were detained by the ice, had sent home their crews to the different provinces to which they belonged. Thus it is evident that it was not the effects of the Russian prowess, but the intense cold, that overcame the French army.

Two large divisions of Prussian troops, amounting to thirty thousand men, and forming the whole of the 10th corps of the Grand Army, capitulated to the Russian general De Diebetsch. Nothing so clearly shews the weakness to which the French army was reduced, as a circumstance attendant on this capitulation. General D'Yorck, who commanded the Prussians, being at Tawroggen, about twenty-five miles from Tilsit, on the 30th of December, entered into a convention with the above general, positively on behalf of his own troops, and conditionally on behalf of those under general Massenbach, which latter were at the moment with the French general Macdonald. D'Yorck immediately sent notice of the step he had taken to general Massenbach, who, notwithstanding the threats and remonstrances of Macdonald, actually marched away from him with his whole division, which the French general was not strong enough to hinder.

The king of Prussia received intelligence of the treason of general D'Yorck on the 14th of January, 1813, and immediately ordered, that " all means should be taken to seize the said general, and send him to Berlin, where he should be tried and punished for his crime." M. de Natzmer, aid-de-camp to the king, set out on the morning of the 5th for Konigsberg, charged with a letter, by which his majesty, after having declared that he could not ratify the convention concluded by general D'Yorck, considering, that the dispositions to be taken with respect to his troops, belong, according to the treaty of alliance, to his majesty the emperor of the French, and afterwards to the king of Naples, as his lieutenant-general, invites this prince to give his orders to general Kleist, and to express them to major de Natzmer, who will make known to the Prussian corps the wishes of their sovereign.

About the close of January, general Rapp, a brave and intrepid soldier, was governor of Dantzig, where he had a garrison of thirty thousand good troops; and the place was said to be provisioned for two years. Dantzig was blockaded by the Russians, who had advanced to the Vistula in great force. Time after time this fortress was said to have surrrendered to the Russian forces; but although it had been besieged as it were by the Russian and Prussian soldiery ever since the middle of February, and they had lost many men before its walls, it was still in the hands of the French in the middle of June, the Russians, however, got possession of Konigsberg, Elbing, Marienberg, and Marienwurder.

The Russian army kept advancing and made their entrance into Warsaw; after which they marched towards the Oder, for the purpose of fighting and dispersing such French troops as might have been collected in and about Posen. An action of some importance there took place, in which the Russians, from the amazing disparity of the French army, were victorious; and on the 20th of February, two days after the battle, they occupied Berlin, with nineteen thousand men. They then proceeded to Hamburgh, which they entered on the 28th.

There does not appear to have been any French force capable of disputing the field with them.

The king of Prussia having left Berlin and proceeded to Potzdam, and his capital being in possession of the Russians, determined him at length to veer about once more, and to enter into an alliance offensive and defensive with the emperor Alexander.

Although the French forces were not in sufficient strength to oppose the numerous hordes of Russians with their Prussian auxilliaries, yet the genius of the French emperor was on the alert. By the beginning of April he had an army of nearly one hundred and fifty thousand men in the field; but the Russians, who found little to oppose them advanced to the Elbe, which they crossed. By this time, however, the principal line of assemblage of the French forces was from Mayence to Bamberg, following the serpentine course of the Mayne: thus the troops under the duke of Treviso were at Frankfort, with Sebastiani and Lefevre; Souham at Aschaffenberg; the prince of Moskwa had his head quarters at Hanau; the Bavarian general Wrede was at Bamberg; and Hesse and Baden were uniting in the vicinity of Wurtzburg.

The Russians who had crossed the Elbe under generals Dormberg and Tschermcheff advanced against general Morand at Luneburg, where he was with three thousand five hundred French forces. A very obstinate battle took place between the French and Russians, which was completely in favour of the latter, the whole body of the French being killed, wounded, or taken; but it should be recollected, that the Russian force was three times greater than the French. They, however, enjoyed their conquest but a short time; for the French sent ten thousand men to retake the town, which they did, and put the Russians to flight.

The Russians and Prussians advanced upon, and took possession of Dresden, the capital of the king of Saxony, who was persuaded to enter into a league against France; but these successes of the Russians at length roused the active Napoleon, and he set out from Paris on the night of the 15th of April, to put himself at the head of his forces in the neighbourhood of Magdeburgh; and although greatly inferior in point of numerical strength to the Allies, he had ordered reinforcements to be continually sent to join his main army.

Affairs at the close of April, began to wear rather a gloomy aspect at Hamburgh. The French, who drove the Russians out of Luneburg, marched into Hamburgh on the 29th; but the Russians and the detachments of the Hanseatic legion had provisionally recrossed the Elbe, deeming themselves not in sufficient force to meet the French. Thorn and Spandau, however, surrendered to the Allies. The emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia had also marched upon, and took possession of Dresden, the capital of the king of Saxony, as above mentioned, who had withdrawn to Prague.

Napoleon by this time, had joined his army, and a partial battle took place on the 1st of May at Weissenfels, in which marshal Bessieres, the duke of Istria, was killed, and the French advanced upon Lutzen. The emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia, learning that the French army had debouched from Thuringia, adopted the plan of giving battle in the plains of Lutzen, and put themselves in motion to occupy that position; but they were anticipated by the rapidity of the movements of the French army: they, however, persisted in their projects, and resolved to drive the French army from the position it had taken. The Allies debouched and passed the Elster at the bridges of Zwenkaw, Pegau, and Zeits. At nine in the morning of the 3rd of May, Napoleon heard a cannonade from the side nearest Leipsig. The allies defended the small village of Tastenau, and the bridges in advance of Leipsig. The French emperor now waited the moment when these last positions should be carried, to put in motion all his army in that direction, make it pivot on Leipsig, pass to the right bank of the Elster, and take the Allies à revers; but at ten o'clock the Allies debouched towards Kara, upon several columns extremely deep: their numbers appeared immense.

The battle now became brisk. The Allies, who appeared certain of success, marched to reach the right of the French, and gain the road of Weissenfels; but in this they were disappointed, and the field of battle was soon covered with the best of the enemy's cavalry. The great efforts of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, were directed against the centre. The village of Kara was taken and retaken several times. The battle embraced a line of two leagues, covered with fire, smoke, and clouds of dust. The Allies having bent their principal force upon the French centre, it gave way; but general Drouet with a battery of eighty pieces of artillery opened a dreadful fire upon the Allies: they now gave way on all sides. The duke of Treviso obtained possession of the village of Kara, overthrew the Allies, and continued to advance, beating the charge. The cavalry, infantry, and artillery of the Allies now retreated on all sides; which being followed by the French, they fled and were pursued for a league and a half. The French soon arrived at the heights which had been occupied by the emperor Alexander, the king of Prussia, and the Brandenburgh family during the battle. The French made several thousand prisoners, notwithstanding the inferiority of their numbers. The loss of the French, in killed and wounded, amounted to ten thousand men: that of the Allies, who were greatly superior in numerical strength, was estimated at upwards of twenty thousand. The prince of Hesse Homberg was killed, the young prince-royal of Prussia was wounded, and the prince of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, nephew to the queen of England, was killed. The Allied army amounted from between one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand men, while that of the French did not exceed one hundred and thirty thousand, and most of these new-raised forces.

In consequence of the battle of Lutzen, the French advanced about eighty miles, though the Prussian account intimates that the Allies remained masters of the field of battle.

The French emperor entered Dresden on the 8th of May. As the French advanced after the battle of Lutzen, several affairs of minor importance took place. The king of Saxony, who had been obliged to leave his capital when the Russian and Prussian combined army advanced upon it, returned to it at mid-day on the 12th, when the French emperor and he embraced each other. So far therefore, from joining the Allies, as it was fondly expected, and positively asserted, the king of Saxony, after his conference with the emperor of Austria at Prague, surrendered his fortresses to the French, and joined Napoleon with the whole of his forces (g).

On the 18th Bonaparte left Dresden, and arrived be(g) The king of Saxony is the most powerful and respectable of the German princes, next to the emperor of Austria, and by thus completely detaching Saxony from the cause of the confederates Bonaparte gained a decided superiority over the Allies.

fore

fore Bautzen on the 19th, at ten in the morning; after which he employed the remainder of the day in reconnoitring the position of the allies. At noon, on the 20th, a brisk cannonade commenced in the neighbourhood of Bautzen, which lasted six hours; during which several charges were made by the allies without success; for general Compans took possession of Bautzen; and general Bonnet, by a running charge, took possession of a plain which rendered him master of the whole of the centre of the allied forces, and at seven in the evening they were driven back on their second position. The French emperor entered Bautzen at eight in the evening. The battle of Bautzen was the prelude to the battle of Wurtchen.

On the 21st, the French emperor marched towards the heights, three quarters of a league in advance of Bautzen, at five o'clock in the morning. At eleven the duke of Treviso advanced one thousand toises from his position, and engaged in a dreadful cannonade before all the redoubts and entrenchments of the allies, and by the manœuvres of the French they were kept in a state of uncertainty respecting the real point of attack. At length the allies, finding that the French had succeeded in turning their right, began to retreat, and this retreat soon became a flight; and at seven in the evening, the prince of Moskwa and general Lauriston arrived at Wurtchen. The allies being now forced from all their positions, left the French masters of the field of battle, who found it covered with the dead and wounded, and took several thousand prisoners.

On the 22nd, at four in the morning, the French army was again in motion. The allies had continued their flight during the whole of the night, by all the roads, and in every direction. The French did not find their first posts till they had passed Weissemburg; nor did they offer the least resistance, until they had gained the heights in the rear of Reickenbach. General Lefebure Desnouettes, at the head of one thousand five hundred horse of the Polish lancers, and the red lancers of the guards, charged and overthrew the Russian cavalry in the plain of Rettenbach. In the battles of the 20th and 21st the French estimated their loss at eleven or twelve thousand men in killed and wounded. On the 22nd, the duke of Treviso was wounded, general Kirgener was killed on the spot, and the duke of Trioul (Duroc) was mortally wounded, and died twelve hours afterwards. On the 23rd, general Reynier entered Goerlitz. The allies burnt a great quantity of their baggage, blew up a number of parks, and distributed through the villages great quantities of wounded, ten thousand of whom remained in the power of the French.

On the 29th of May there was a severe engagement at Ochsenwarder: the Hanseatic legion, Prussians, and English riflemen, made a strong resistance against the enemy; but owing to a blunder of captain Muller, who took a party of the French, they being commanded in English, to be English, one thousand five hundred men took possession of Ochsenwarder. General Tettenborn informed the senate, that he had no longer the means of defence, and left it entirely with the senate to adopt such measures as they thought proper; after which he left the place, and at mid-day on the 30th, the Danes, five thousand strong, with a park of artillery, entered Hamburgh, having the French general Bruyere, at their head; at seven in the evening one thousand five hundred French gens d'armes entered the town (h).

On the 1st of June, an armistice having been previously proposed, the duke of Vicenza, on the part of the French and the Russian and Prussian plenipotentiaries, count Schouvaloff and general Kleist, exchanged their full powers, and neutralized the village of Peicherwitz. Forty infantry and twenty cavalry, furnished by the French army, and the same number of men furnished by the allied army, respectively occupied the two entrances of the village. On the 2nd, in the morning, the plenipotentiaries had a conference to fix the line which, during the armistice, should determine the position of the two armies. In the mean time, orders were given from the head quarters of both armies, that no hostilities should take place. The armistice was signed on the 4th; and it was agreed that hostilities should cease till the 8th of July inclusive, and that they should not re-commence without giving six days notice to that effect. By this armistice the French were to remain in possession of every thing which it occupied on the 8th of June at midnight.

Having brought our account of the war between France and Russia to the latest possible period, the middle of the year 1813, it is necessary that we revert to our parliamentary history, in which, however, we find but little worth recording; but we must not pass over without notice the assassination of the right honourable Spencer Perceval, on the 11th of May, 1812. As the right honourable gentleman was entering the lobby of the house of commons, about a quarter after five o'clock in the afternoon, where a considerable number of persons were standing, a Mr. Bellingham, a merchant of Liverpool, drew out a small pistol from his pocket, and fired at Mr. Perceval, who received the contents in his left breast, the ball entering his heart. Mr. Perceval moved forwards a few faultering steps, and then fell. The only words he uttered were, "I am murdered," but the latter word was inarticulate, the sound dying between his lips. He was instantly taken to the room of the speaker's secretary, to the left of the lobby, where he expired in about ten or twelve minutes. His brother, lord Arden, among several others, was present at his death. Mr. Lynn, the surgeon, who examined the wound, found that the ball, which was of a large size, had penetrated the heart near the centre, and had passed completely through it. The deed was perpetrated so suddenly, that the man who fired the pistol was not instantly recognized by those in the lobby; but a person passing at the moment behind Mr. Perceval, seized the pistol, and the assassin was instantly secured, and asked if he were the villain who shot the minister; to which he replied, "I am the unhappy man; my name is Bellingham." There were found on his person the fellow pistol to that with which he effected the fatal purpose, and a bundle of papers folded like letters. The pistol found upon him was loaded. He was then conducted to the bar of the house of commons, where the greatest confusion prevailed; but on order being restored, general Gascoigne said, in an audible voice, "I think I know the villain; and walking up to the assassin, and looking him in the face, inquired, "Is not your name Bellingham?" To which he made no reply.

On the examination of witnesses by the magistrates before whom Mr. Bellingham was taken, general Gascoine, the member for Liverpool, stated, that he had seen Bellingham often, and that he had received petitions and memorials from him respecting some claims upon government, which he ought to have been allowed. These demands originated in services which Bellingham performed in Russia, but for which he complained he had received no remuneration. He had made numerous similar ineffectual applications to Mr. Perceval, and to the Speaker. He said, that he had made application to every person likely to procure him redress; and that he had at length been driven to despair, by being told at the public offices, he might do his worst. "I have obeyed them," added he: "I have done my worst, and I rejoice in the deed."

On the following morning (May 12,) the coroner's inquest sat on the body of Mr. Spencer Perceval, and after the examination of several witnesses, the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against John Bellingham, alias Ballingham." Suffice it to say, that Mr. Bellingham was tried for his offence at the Old Bailey, on the 15th, and being found guilty, was executed agreeable to his sentence, on the Monday after he had committed the murder. It was the opinion of several persons that Mr. Bellingham was insane, and they blamed the precipitancy with which he was brought to trial. It is certain that he had been insane; and one of the witnesses who voluntarily came from (h) The conduct of the crown prince of Sweden (Bernadotte) on this occasion appears to have something mystical in it. He entered Germany at the head of twenty-four thousand men, and eighty pieces of artillery, but when applied to by the senate of Hamburgh, he replied, "That Hamburgh was at present but a minor object, compared with his ulterior movements, and that the fate of that city must be decided by the issue of the contest for the general deliverance." Thus Bernadotte constantly appeared to be in the way to do something; but took care always to avoid coming into action; indeed it could not be expected that he would become the enemy of his old master Bonaparte. Sweden, however, was paid by England, and the crown prince must appear to do something. The treaty which the English ministers entered into with Sweden, was at length reluctantly laid before the house of lords on the 10th of June, and the next day before the house of commons. The substance of this treaty is, "That the English pay One Million of Pounds sterling per annum, as a subsidy; that Great Britain shall cede the island of Guadaloupe to the Swedes; and the English shall assist the crown prince in his views on Norway with a sufficient naval force. Guadaloupe to be delivered to the crown prince three months after the Swedes make good their landing in Germany." Now Bernadotte did land with a powerful army on the shores of Germany, but has hitherto remained inactive; the English, however, are bound by treaty to give up the island in August to the Swedes!

Southampton,

Southampton, and knew him from a child, and was well acquainted with his family, swore that his father died insane in Titchfield Street, Oxford Road, and that Bellingham appeared to be deranged whenever he mentioned his affairs in Russia (i).

In consequence of the death of Mr. Perceval the country was for some time without a person at the head of the government, and it was not till several gentlemen had been applied to, whom the contention of party would not allow to take an active share in the administration, that an efficient ministry could be formed. At length the following noblemen were appointed to the principal offices in the administration: The earl of Liverpool, first lord of the treasury; the right honourable N. Vansittart, chancellor of the Exchequer; lord Eldon, lord chancellor; the earl of Harrowby, president of the council; lord Castlereagh, secretary of state for foreign affairs; lord Sidmouth, secretary for home affairs; earl Bathurst, secretary at war; lord Melville, secretary of the admiralty; the earl of Westmoreland, lord privy seal; lord Buckinghamshire, board of controul; and lord Mulgrave, master of the ordnance. On the 30th of July, this parliament was prorogued.

We have before observed that the parliamentary history of this period contained very little matter of importance; therefore, we shall pass over the debates of a trifling nature, and conclude with the observations on the late treaty with Sweden, which took place in the house of commons on the 18th of June, 1813.

Mr. Ponsonby, in the house of commons, when the late treaty with Sweden was animadverted upon (k), said, in allusion to that part which concerned Denmark, the honourable gentlemen (lord Castlereagh) observed, that the treaty said—"The two contracting powers, being unwilling, if it can be avoided, to make an enemy of the king of Denmark."—If it can be avoided! How modest are their expressions! how gentle their manners! how kind their intention! Being unwilling to make an enemy of the king of Denmark! Unwilling to make an enemy of whom? of a monarch with whom neither of the parties pretended to have the slightest cause of quarrel. But, feeling this virtuous reluctance, what do they propose to do—"They will offer to his Danish majesty, to procure for him a compleat indemnity for Norway, by a territory more contiguous to his German dominions, provided his Danish majesty will cede for ever his rights to the kingdom of Norway." Here are the deliverers of Europe, contracting between themselves, for the purposes of their own base ambition, to take from an unoffending potentate, a portion of his ancient territory—to tear from him who wore the crown of Denmark, a most valuable part of his dominions, that it may be given to one of these parties, as an equivalent for that which had been wrested from him. But, it seems, they are to give to the king of Denmark—a full compensation for Norway: that is, by granting to him "certain other territories, more contiguous to his dominions in Germany!" I do beseech you, sir, to look to the circumstances under which this flagitious offer was made. France was to be driven back to her ancient boundaries; Germany was to be delivered—all Europe was to be freed from the grasp of the French emperor, by the united force of Russia and Sweden! and in order to induce the people of Germamy to make an effort against France, how did these liberators act? They take a part of Denmark and give it to Sweden—a province to which neither had any claim—and they offer an indemnity to the former by some dominions contiguous to his German territories. The policy of this stipulation, which must disgust the people of Germany, is equal to its injustice. And how any cabinet in this country, acting under a monarch remarkable for his own good faith, and high sense of honour, remarkable for his own scrupulous attention to the dictates of justice—a monarch, the greater part of whose reign has been spent in carrying on a bloody and expensive war, to prevent France from establishing the very principles contained in this treaty:—that the ministers of such a king could have the hardihood to call upon that monarch and the nation which he governs to accede to a treaty like that entered into between Russia and Sweden, exceeds any thing to be found in the history of courts, or of the world. Sir, if the ministers of this country absolutely wanted to establish the system of France throughout Europe—that system so often and justly reprobated—they could not have adopted a proceeding better calculated to produce that effect, than by advising the crown and parliament to sanction this convention. Do we, sir, throughout the whole of it, find any one sentence expressive of an anxiety for the liberties of mankind, or the general interests of the world? Yet, sir, notwithstanding the abominable and atrocious stipulations which this convention contains, we are made to say, in our treaty with Sweden, which recognizes the convention, "that the transfer of Norway from its rightful monarch—that the separation of the people from their lawful sovereign, shall take place with every possible regard and consideration for the hapiness and liberty of the people of Norway."

Lord Castlereagh defended the treaty, and concluded by expressing his hopes, that the house would reject the address to the prince-regent, praying that he would order the substance of the late negociation between this country and Denmark, relative to the pacific proposition made by the latter kingdom to be laid before the house, an address which, if carried, he said, would mark ministers as unfit for their situation, and expose them to disgrace in the face of our allies, and of all Europe.

Mr. Canning said, as an obstacle to peace, he particularly lamented the stipulation of this treaty. We had bound ourselves to give a priority to Norway and Guadaloupe in our negociations, which placed us at the mercy or caprice of the enemy, and would almost enable him to dictate his own terms in admitting equivalents. Why was it forgotten, that Portugal, Spain, and Sicily were to be provided for in our negociations, as objects of primary importance?

And Mr. Whitbread considered the annexation of Norway, stipulated for in this treaty, as one of the worst acts and most mischievous examples in the history of modern times. It rivalled the worst acts of the French revolutionists. What should we have thought if France had proposed the annexation and perpetuity of Ireland to the kingdom of Spain. The present case was equally flagrant.

We have now to advert to our affairs with the United States of America, and the circumstances which preceded the war in which we are at present engaged with that power. For a long time disagreements had subsisted between the two nations, principally occasioned by the pretended right of British officers searching American ships for British seamen, and if any such were found on board the American vessels, their forcibly taking them out and compelling them to serve on board his majesty's ships of war. This, however, the Americans strongly remonstrated against; and negociations were set on foot, but the matter was never amicably adjusted. The orders in council too, was another source of discontent, and these were still, notwithstanding the negociations, continued in full force, by which the Americans suffered greatly in their trade.

At length, in the beginning of June, 1812, intelligence was received, that a bill had been brought into the house of representatives, which contained seven clauses relating to the matters in dispute with this country. It passed the first reading by a majority of fifty-three to twenty-eight, and after this decisive progress had little difficulty in proceeding through the remaining stages. In this bill, which was entitled, "A Bill for the more effectual Protection of American Seamen, &c." it is enacted, "That any British or other subjects, proved to have been guilty of impressing American seamen, shall be deemed pirates and felons,

(i) The right honourable Spencer Perceval was second son of the late lord Egmont, by Catharine, third daughter of the honourable Charles Compton. He was born on the 1st of November, 1762, and was therefore in the fiftieth year of his age. He was married in August, 1790, to Jane, second daughter to sir Thomas Wilson, bart. by whom he had twelve children. The Irish title of lord Arden descended to Mr. Perceval's full brother, in right of their mother, who was of the Northampton family; and from one of this family Mr. Perceval took the name of Spencer, and by his connection with it he established his interest in the borough of Northampton, which he long represented in parliament. Mr. Perceval was admitted a student of Lincoln's Inn, December 16, 1782; called to the bar in January, 1786, and made a bencher in February, 1796. He became solicitor-general in Mr. Addington's first administration, and afterwards attorney-general, when Mr. Law was made chief justice of the king's bench. In this office he continued till Mr. Pitt came again into office, and retained it till the death of that minister. When the administration of lords Grenville and Grey resigned, Mr. Perceval came into office as chancellor of the Exchequer and of the duchy of Lancaster, under the name and sanction of the duke of Portland, as first lord of the treasury; and when that nobleman died, became and continued till the moment of his death at the head of the administration. Such was the feeling of the government on account of Mr. Perceval's assassination, that, notwithstanding the immense taxes the nation had to pay by reason of the war, fifty thousand pounds were granted to his younger children, one thousand per annum to his eldest son, and two thousand per annum to his widow, which upon her demise was to be enjoyed by the eldest son.

(k) See the note above, p. 631.

and

and punished with death; such persons to be tried on the spot, wherever they may be found:

"That the president be authorized to order the ships of war of the United States to bring in any foreign armed vessels that may be found on the coast, molesting American ships, or hovering on their shores.

"That American seamen, who shall have been impressed, shall be authorized to levy on British debts, or British property in America, as an indemnification, for the time of detention, at the rate of thirty dollars a month each; an exhibition of that claim by the creditor, &c. in America, to be considered a sufficient discharge to the claimant in Great Britain."

By the further clauses of this bill, the American flag is made to cover all persons on board, excepting such as may be in the actual service of Great Britain; and it is ordered, that the government do seize so many British subjects in the United States, or in the territories of Great Britain, as shall be equivalent to the number of Americans detained on board the British navy; these hostages to be detained until exchanged by the usual way of cartel.

The above transaction of the American government seems to have roused the British ministers to a sense of their danger, and in the supplement to the London Gazette of the 23rd of June, appeared a revocation of those noxious decrees, the orders in council, so far as they related to America. The British minister also followed up this revocation by granting licences of protection to such American vessels as might in consequence take out British ladings, to secure them from capture in the event of acts of hostility having commenced between this country and the United States, before their arrival (l).

When Mr. Foster, the English ambassador in America, received the declaration of the British ministry of the 14th of April, relative to the orders in council, he sent it, with a short complimentary note, to Mr. Munroe, to which the latter replied by a question, desiring to know whether the rescinding of the Berlin and Milan decrees with respect to America, would be such a revocation as would render the orders in council of Great Britain invalid and nugatory? Mr. Foster not giving a satisfactory answer to this inquiry, the president sent a message to the house of representatives, recommending a declaration of war against his Britannic majesty. This subject was deliberated upon with closed doors, and was decided in favour of war, by a majority of seventy-nine to forty-nine.

At length, owing to the delays of the British ministers in rescinding the orders in council with respect to America, a message was sent to the senate and house of representatives of the United States, dated the 1st of June, in which the Americans sum up their complaints against Great Britain under three heads: The impressment of American seamen; the right of putting an entire coast in a state of siege, by what are called Paper Blockades; and the effects of the orders in council. This message, which is signed by the president, was shortly after followed by "An act, declaring war between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof, and the United States of America and their territories.

"Be it enacted, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, 'That war be and the same is hereby declared to exist between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof, and the United States of America, and their territories, and that the president of the United States be and is hereby authorized to use the whole land and naval forces of the United States to carry the same into effect, and to issue to the private armed vessels commissions or letters of marque and general reprisal, in such form as he shall think proper, and under the seal of the United States, against the vessels, goods, and effects of the government of the said United kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the subjects thereof.'

"June 18, 1812. (Approved "JAMES MADISON."

The Americans shortly after sent a squadron of ships to sea, under the command of commodore Rodgers, and a body of land forces to Upper Canada, under the command of general Hull.

On the 16th of August, major-general Brock, captured the important post of Fort Detroit and two thousand five hundred men under brigadier-general Hull, commander of the North-Western American army, without the loss of a single man.

On the 19th of August, the United States' frigate Constitution, Isaac Hull, esq. commander, fell in with the British frigate Guerriere, commanded by Jas. R. Dacres, esq. A well-fought action took place, in which the commanders and crews of both ships behaved with the greatest courage and magnanimity; the Guerriere was a perfect wreck, and compelled to strike her colours, after which she was set fire to by orders of captain Hull, and blew up in about half an hour.

Another victory was obtained over the Americans on the 13th of October, when nine hundred prisoners, and the commander of the American forces, surrendered themselves on the field of battle; but the English commander, general Brock, was slain in the beginning of the action.

On the 25th of October, the Macedonian frigate, of thirty-eight guns, commanded by captain John Surman Carden, was captured by the United States, commodore Decatur. On board the English frigate were one hundred and four killed and wounded.

In the supplement to the London Gazette of January 9, 1813, was published a long recriminatory declaration of the British government, in reply to a message of the president of the United States. This declaration expresses the intention of the prince regent rigidly to abide by the British system of blockade, avows a determination never to give up the right of search, and throws upon America the whole blame of the war.

This verbose, but important declaration, (though it be infinitely too long for us to insert,) relative to the war with America, demands a few observations, in which we shall simply confine ourselves to one topic—the right claimed by Great Britain of searching American vessels for British seamen. This we are persuaded is the real foundation of the dispute between the two countries; and we cannot help expressing our concern that each party seems determined not in the least to recede from the pretensions it has laid down. Were we to analyze the ground of this difference, we should find the whole to arise from the similarity of language, dress, and habits, which characterize the English and the American sailor. It is that which creates the abuse; and it is the abuse the Americans chiefly complain of.

The position advanced by the English in this declaration—that a man is born with certain bonds of allegiance, which he cannot legally transfer to another country, is, we think, incontrovertible. And we certainly agree with the declaration in its assertion of the right to taking English subjects wheresoever they may be found. It is of the most vital importance to England that she ever maintains this right; but in acting upon it she should be willing to give every security to the Americans, that it is English subjects, and them alone, whose allegiance she claims, and whose services she insists on. That the exercise of this right is, and ever will be, from existing circumstances, peculiarly open to abuse, there can be no question; but we cannot help entertaining the idea that arrangements might be made, which would have the effect of reducing those abuses to a very narrow compass.

The complaint of the Americans is, that under pretence of searching for British seamen, their vessels are boarded, and without further proof than the mere assertion of an English naval officer, the best of their crews are selected, forced into the British navy, and ultimately compelled to fight against the country that gave them birth. Such is the American statement; and we are compelled to acknowledge it too often substantiated by facts. On the other hand, the British assert, So long as you hold out inducements for our sailors to desert, by their easy attainment of American letters of naturalization, so long must you be subject to the injuries consequent on the right of search. From this slight view of the ground of our quarrel with the United States, it is clearly apparent, that each party must concede something, or the war must be eternal: and this we imagine might easily be done without compromising the interests or the honour of either nation.

(l) In consequence of this revocation of the orders in council, the accounts which were received in London towards the close of June from the country were filled with relations of the rejoicings of the manufacturing districts. At Sheffield, Birmingham, and Stafford, bonfires, bell-ringing, and firing of cannon, announced the revival of hope in the industrious; and in a letter from Leeds it was said, "The beneficial effects of the repeal of the orders in council are already apparent, in the impulse given to the woollen trade. Bales of cloth, which have been stored in the warehouses of the American merchants for months, in some instances for years, are now in transit to the place of their destination; and we are peculiarly happy to state, that there were more purchasers in Leeds cloth-hall one morning, than there has been on any market day since the enactment of the celebrated orders in council."

The Java frigate, of forty-six guns, sailed from Spithead early in November, 1812, for the purpose of conveying general Hislop and suite to Bombay; but she was fell in with off the coast of Brazil by the Constitution frigate, belonging to the United States; and after a serious action, in which captain Lambert, of the Java and many of his officers and men were killed, was taken; but, like the Guerriere, she was reduced to such a state of wreck, that the enemy could not carry her into port. She was therefore destroyed. The loss sustained on board the Java was sixty-nine killed, and one hundred and seventy wounded; whilst the loss on board the Constitution was only nine killed and twenty-five wounded.

On the 23rd of April, 1813, dispatches were received by government from lieutenant-general sir G. Prevost, dated Quebec, February 8, containing an account of the total defeat of a part of the American army, under the command of general Winchester, at French Town, on the river Raisin, twenty-six miles to the south of Detroit, on the 22nd of January. The American force engaged amounted to upwards of one thousand men, of whom about five hundred, including the general and two field officers, were taken prisoners, and the remainder either killed or wounded. General Proctor, who commanded the British force engaged, spoke highly of the conduct of his troops. The loss sustained by the British amounted to twenty-four killed, and one hundred and fifty-eight wounded.

In the London Gazette of June 5, was a letter from sir George Prevost, which announced that colonel Macdonell had crossed the river St. Lawrence, and had surprized the Americans at Ogdenburgh, and taken eleven pieces of cannon, four officers, and seventy men prisoners.

Thus have we brought our account of the war with America to the latest possible date; and have only now to mention the unhappy difference which took place between the Prince Regent and his Royal Consort, and although we lament that such difference should ever have subsisted, yet we cannot but rejoice that her Royal Highness has completely established her innocency against the false accusations that were made against her honour and her life.

In the autumn of 1794, his majesty thought it adviseable that the prince of Wales should be married, which was accordingly hinted to his royal highness, but in so delicate a manner, as to leave it entirely to his option. The matter rested for some time, till one day, his royal highness praising the person and accomplishments of his sister the princess Mary, before the duke of Clarence, the duke observed, she was very like the princess of Brunswic, whom he had the honour of knowing, and had conversed with. Upon this the prince became more inquisitive, and the duke so satisfied him in all particulars, as to afford him the highest gratification. The affair again dropped for some time, till on the morning of a great gala, at Windsor, his royal highness mentioned it to a great personage, who was pleased with the proposal, and it was immediately communicated to the queen, who felt equal satisfaction. Overtures were then made to the court of Brunswic, which were favourably received; after which his majesty appointed the right honourable James earl of Malmesbury, "to negociate, conclude, and sign a treaty of marriage between his royal highness the prince of Wales, and the princess Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, daughter to his most illustrious highness the duke of Brunswic and Lunenburg." The treaty of marriage being concluded in December, 1794, was transmitted to the court of St. James's, and was sent back, on the 16th of the same month, finally ratified.

On the 24th of March, 1795, her serene highness the princess Caroline of Brunswic left Hanover, where she had resided some time after her departure from Brunswic, and proceeded on her route to England, where she landed at Greenwich Hospital, on the 5th of April. They were married on the 8th, and addresses from the city of London, and other corporations, were presented to their majesties and to their royal highnesses, which were graciously received, and appropriate answers returned. On the 7th of January, 1796, her royal highness was delivered of a princess at Carleton House; and on the 11th of February, the infant princess was baptized by the name of Charlotte Carolina Augusta (m).

On the prince of Wales's marriage with this illustrious lady, he was emancipated from his enormous accumulated debts; but her royal highness brought other claims to love and gratitude. She was truly represented at the time as a person of great beauty, but not greater than her sweetness of manners, her acquired accomplishments, and her strength and greatness of mind. She was received in England with transports of joy: addresses of admiration and gratitude poured in upon her from all quarters, and her husband was congratulated as the happiest of men. A similar torrent of addresses poured in upon the birth of the princess Charlotte of Wales. In short, no events seem ever to have caused such unmixed joy in this country, as did the marriage of this illustrious lady and the birth of her child. And who, at that day, could have anticipated, that a time would arrive, when the mother would have to complain, and even to make public her complaints, of being debarred a free communication with that child?

The tranquillity of the prince and princess was, however, but of short duration; for, only one year and twenty-two days, that is, about three months after the birth of the princess Charlotte, his royal highness, after the most mature deliberation, wrote a letter to his consort, in which he said, respecting "the terms upon which they were to live,"—"Our inclinations are not in our power, nor should either of us be answerable to the other, because nature has not made us suitable to each other. Tranquil and comfortable society, however, is in our power. Let our intercourse be restricted to that." This letter was dated April 30, 1796.

Matrimonial differences, we know, are of that delicate nature, that we think they should ever be left to be terminated by the parties who are most interested. In the case, however, before us, a stigma, the most undeserving, had for years rested on the lady, which deprived her of many of the privileges of her rank; and owing to that, she was compelled to live in a state of seclusion at Montague House on Blackheath. At length his majesty, in 1806, by a commission, appointed certain lords to enquire into her royal highness's conduct, and to make a report thereof to his majesty. This was accordingly done, and the noblemen who made the enquiry, entirely exculpated the princess from the charges exhibited and sworn to against her. Her royal highness was afterwards re-admitted to his majesty's society, from which she had been secluded; and very little would have been known of the depositions of the witnesses examined against her, particularly sir John and lady Douglas, and a few others, but for the exertions of Mr. Spencer Perceval, who collected them together, and printed them in a volume, which contained his majesty's commission for entering on the inquiry, (commonly called the Delicate Investigation,) and several letters from her royal highness, his majesty, the lord chancellor, and others, on the subject (n).

One of the principal facts which lady Douglas charged her royal highness with, was that of being brought to bed of a boy during her separation from her royal consort, and when no intercourse had subsisted between them; but of all the filthy, obscene, false, and diabolical depositions, that were ever sworn to, that of lady Charlotte Douglas is one of the worst. "Independently of the princess's confession to me, I can swear (says the wife of him, who is now major-general sir John Douglas) that she was pregnant in 1802." But that which her ladyship here swears upon her own knowledge to be true, is now known to all the world to be false.

On the investigation of the princess's conduct, Sophia Austin, a poor woman, positively swore, that she was herself brought to bed in Brownlow Street Hospital, and produced a copy of the register of the child's birth,—of the very child which lady Charlotte Douglas swore was the princess's.

Her royal highness's defence, written by the late Mr. Spencer Perceval, lord Eldon, and sir Thomas Plomer, occupied one hundred and eighty folio pages, and comprized answers to all the material charges brought against her royal highness, and refuted them in so natural, so easy,

(m) The princess Charlotte of Wales was born precisely nine months from the day of the prince of Wales's marriage, and will be eighteen years of age on the next anniversary of her birth-day, that is, January 7, 1814. The princess, who is their only child, is, of course, heiress to the throne.

(n) This book, which was so full of false accusations, calumny, and perjury against her royal highness, it was attempted to suppress, by the purchase of the copies; but the book had been published, it was gone abroad; and notwithstanding the large sums that had been lavished, to get the whole of the copies into their hands, those who had the direction of it were miserably disappointed.

and

and so unpremeditated a manner, that he must be a sceptic indeed, who, after reading it, can for a single moment doubt the innocence of this much injured lady.

From what transpired, it was abundantly evident, that for years before the first enquiry took place, that her royal highness had been surrounded with spies and informers, whose business it was narrowly to watch her conduct, and carefully to register every action upon which a bad construction, in their upright opinion, might be put. She never rose an hour earlier in the morning, or sat up an hour later than usual in the evening, but it was noted down, with all the exactness of the most rigid accountant. Every gentleman who visited her underwent the same scrutinizing observation. If she walked, she walked with some wicked design;—if she rode, she must have had some motive for riding, and that must have been a bad one;—if she ate in the same room with a gentleman, that was considered, at least, as suspicious;—and if she sat on the same sofa with one, although a hundred ladies were present, that was proof positive. In short, every one must be convinced, and coincide with Mr. Whitbread, who declared in the house of commons, that the allegations against her were too serious to be ridiculous—yet too ridiculous to be serious.

When his majesty, the princess of Wales's uncle and father-in-law, was in bodily health, he was friendly to her royal highness, and if any restrictions had been put upon her with respect to her visits to her royal daughter, she could, and would have appealed to his majesty, and they would have been removed; but no such restrictions were then put upon her: this was an after matter, which at length became so intolerable towards the close of 1812, that her royal highness resolved to apply to her husband, the prince regent, upon the subject. Consequently, in the beginning of 1813, her royal highness addressed a long letter to the prince regent, which appeared in most of the public papers of the day.

In consequence of the publication of this letter, a fresh enquiry was set on foot, which commenced on the 11th of February, 1813, and continued several days; after which the commissioners made their report to the prince regent, which tended to establish the princess of Wales's innocency, and yet allowed that she ought to be restricted from visiting her royal daughter.

This report occasioned the princess of Wales to apply to parliament, throwing herself upon its wisdom and justice. Accordingly, in the house of commons, on the 2nd of March, the Speaker addressed the house on the subject, and read the letter which her royal highness addressed to him on the subject of the report just mentioned. In her royal highness's letter to the Speaker is the following passage: "The princess of Wales is, therefore, compelled to throw herself on the wisdom and justice of parliament, and she earnestly desires a full investigation of her conduct during the whole period of her residence in this country. Her royal highness fears no scrutiny, however strict, provided it be conducted by impartial judges, and in a fair and open manner, before a tribunal known to the constitution. It is her royal highness's wish either to be treated as innocent, or proved guilty."

This, as might be supposed, occasioned a vast deal of debate in the house of commons, on the 2nd of March, 1813; and on the 4th, when the speaker called on Mr. Cochrane Johnstone for the motion which he had promised to make relative to the princess of Wales, Mr. Lygon, member for Worcestershire, said, he felt it to be a duty imperative on him, to move the standing order, that strangers should withdraw. This motion called forth loud expressions of disapprobation; but the speaker of course felt it his duty to enforce the standing order of the house, and the gallery was cleared. Mr. Bennett then moved that the house should adjourn. After a debate, in which some members supported Mr. Bennett's motion, while others opposed it, a division ensued, when the numbers were, against the adjournment two hundred and forty-eight, for the adjournment one hundred and thirty; majority one hundred and nine.

The report made to the prince regent was signed by twenty-one members of the council; and Mr. Whitbread said, that if the report was correctly given in the newspaper, (the Pilot of March 4,) he concurred with her royal highness, that aspersions were cast upon her which tended to the insecurity of the state; for there certainly was one passage ambiguously worded, that an inference might be drawn from it, that her royal highness had been guilty of great misconduct; whilst it might also bear the construction, that she was no further blameable than for such things as might be considered but trifling offences.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the report would not bear any such construction as Mr. Whitbread had put upon it, and contended, that the question for the consideration of the council was not one of charge, but one relating to regulations under which her royal highness was to be allowed to see her daughter.

Mr. Whitbread then read the report.

Mr. Cochrane Johnstone said, as the gallery had been cleared, he should postpone making his motion.

Mr. Lygon said, that whenever the motion was made he should move for the clearing of the gallery; and,

Mr. Bennett declared his intention, that whenever the gallery was cleared upon a motion on the subject, to persist in his motion of adjournment. He should repeat his motion, "that the house do now adjourn."

Mr. York expressed his regret that the honourable member (Mr. Bennett) would persist in his resolution, which, he said, would tend to impede the progress of public business.

But sir John Newport trusted that the honourable member (Mr. Bennett) would exercise the power he held of moving an adjournment; and that he would not be deterred by the threats of any man, however high in authority. He begged to remind gentlemen of a period, when a late right honourable friend of his (Mr. Fox) was exhausted by his application to his public duties, some of those gentlemen who, on this occasion, exclaimed against the question of adjournment, had themselves repeated that question, perhaps fourteen or fifteen times in the same evening.

At length, after a vehement debate, which continued till a late hour, Mr. Cochrane Johnstone said, he should bring on his motion again to-morrow.

On the 5th of March, therefore, Mr. Cochrane Johnstone brought forward his motion; and the proceedings of the house of commons on this occasion amounted to a compleat vindication and acquittal of the princess of Wales, not only from all the charges, but from all the aspersions that had been thrown out against her royal highness. In the course of his observations on so foul and false a conspiracy, he insisted that the charge against the princess before the commissioners, by sir John and lady Douglas, was nothing short of treason; that if the commissioners in 1806 had power to acquit her royal highness of the crime charged, they had equally the power to convict her; and what, he asked, would be the state of that country in which such a thing were even possible? Besides, he enquired, what became of sir John and lady Douglas? If he were rightly informed, they persisted in the same story; and if all they maintained were so notoriously false, why were they not prosecuted?

Lord Castlereagh opposed the motion, and said in effect, that her royal highness was completely acquitted by the commissioners; but with respect to sir John and lady Douglas, he said, that the first cabinet distinctly recommended a reference to the law officers of the crown, to consider of such a prosecution; and if it had not been instituted, it did not arise from any doubt in the minds of those law officers, as to the punishment that would be brought down upon the degraded and guilty heads of sir John and lady Douglas, but it was from a wish to avoid bringing such subjects before the public.

At the close of the debate, Mr. York requested Mr. C. Johnstone to withdraw his motion; but Mr. Johnstone refused to do so, adding, that it was a proud day for him, because it had completely established the innocence of her royal highness the princess of Wales.

The question was then put, and Mr. Johnstone's motion was negatived without a division. The house then adjourned.

On the 15th, the subject was again agitated in parliament, when a long desultory conversation took place on the subject; which was at length put an end to by the Speaker's stating, that he had listened with extreme pain to the desultory discussion which had gone on, no question being before the house.

On the 17th, Mr. Whitbread made a motion on the subject of the princess of Wales, which occasioned a very long debate, which tended to establish the innocency of the princess of Wales. On the 22nd, the subject was again resumed, as it was on several other days, when long debates took place, all of which fully established her royal highness's innocency.

again

The innocency of her royal highness the princess of Wales was so completely established, that not even the shadow of a doubt remained on the minds of those who once thought her guilty. She most nobly triumphed over the foul aspersions which had been cast upon her character and her honour; she convinced the world that she feared no open investigation, by seriously demanding a fair and open trial, in which her innocency might be clearly shewn, or her guilt be made manifest. We applaud her energy in the late address which she made to her husband the prince regent, and in her throwing herself upon the wisdom and justice of parliament; in consequence of which her innocence is now made known to the country, and her honour established upon the most solid foundation, notwithstanding the perjuries of "suborned traducers" (o).

The circumstance of the princess of Wales's ill treatment was taken notice of in a very spirited manner by the city of London, a common hall meeting on the 2nd of April, the proceedings of which (though our limits will not permit us to give them) will be read with peculiar interest by generations yet unborn; and the more especially when they consider, that the business under contemplation was one in which party had no share. The zeal and energy manifested in defence of the injured, and in homage to her innocence, were universal. Humanity, and all England, were on one side in this question. Some individuals, who had been the most forward in traducing her character, it was confidently asserted, endeavoured to leave the kingdom, without even the ingenuousness to retract their slander, or the effrontery to persevere in it. Innocence, indeed, appeared to be armed with a spear for the overthrow of her enemies, as well as a shield for her own security. At this meeting of the common hall of the city of London, on the 2nd of April, 1813, as abovementioned, and which does infinite honour to the citizens of the metropolis, it was resolved, "That an humble, loyal, and dutiful address, be presented to her royal highness the princess of Wales, on the subject of the lately exposed, wicked, and cruel attempts against her royal highness's character and life."

The address of the city of London to her royal highness the princess of Wales, was delivered to her royal highness at Kensington palace on the 12th of April; and the princess returned a very appropriate and energetic answer thereto, in which are the following passages: "The sense of indignation and abhorrence you express against the foul and detestable conspiracy, which by perjured and suborned traducers has been carried on against my life and honour, is worthy of you, and most gratifying to me. It must be duly appreciated by every branch of that illustrious house with which I am so closely connected by blood and marriage; the personal welfare of every one of whom must have been affected by the success of such atrocious machinations. The consciousness of my innocence has supported me through my long, severe, and unmerited trials: your approbation of my conduct under them is a reward for all my sufferings."

The example of the city of London was followed by several cities and corporations in different parts of the kingdom. An address to her royal highness was presented from the city of Bristol on the 14th of April. The city of Westminster next presented an address; and the borough of Southwark did the same on the 30th.

On the 28th of April, the common council of London presented an address of congratulation to her royal highness. This was followed on the 29th, by an address from the city of Rochester; and on the 3rd of May, by one from the county of Monmouth. This was also followed by addresses from Berkshire, Worcester, Pembrokeshire, Sheffield, York, Middlesex, and many other places: to all of which her royal highness returned appropriate and affectionate answers.

We had closed our history of the war in the Peninsula, but the decisive victory obtained by lord Wellington over the French forces, on the 21st of June, 1813, near Vittoria, claims our attention; and we cannot close our labours without giving an account of the battle which was fought on that day—a day which will live for ages in the annals of the British empire.

The dispatches, from the marquis Wellington, (which were received at the war office on the 3rd of July,) are dated Salvatierra, June 23, and Trienyeen, June 24, 1813, say, The enemy's army, commanded by Joseph Bonaparte, having marshal Jourdan as the major general of the army, took up a position on the night of the 19th instant, in front of Vittoria, the left of which rested upon the heights which end at Puebla de Arlanzon, and extended from thence across the valley of Zadora, in front of the village Arunez. They occupied with the right of the centre a height which commanded the valley of Zadora, and the right of their army was stationed near Vittoria, and was destined to defend the passages of the river Zadora, in the neighbourhood of that city. They had a reserve in the rear of their left, at the village of Gomecha.

The nature of the country through which the army had passed, since it had reached the Ebro, had necessarily extended our columns, and we halted, says lord Wellington, on the 20th, in order to close them up, and moved the left to Margina, where it was most likely it would be necessary. His lordship reconnoitred the enemy's position on that day, with a view to the attack to be made on the following morning, if they should still remain in it.

The allies accordingly attacked the enemy on the 21st of June, and gained a complete victory over them, driving them from all their positions, and taking from them one hundred and fifty-one pieces of cannon, four hundred and fifteen waggons of ammunition, all their baggage, provisions, cattle, treasure, &c. and a considerable number of prisoners. The operations of the day commenced by lieutenant-general sir Rowland Hill obtaining possession of the heights of La Puebla, on which the enemy's left rested; which heights they had not occupied in great strength. The contest here, however, was very severe, and the loss sustained considerable. General Murillo was wounded, but remained in the field; and the honourable lieutenant-colonel Cadogan died of a wound he received.

Under cover of the possession of these heights, sir Rowland Hill successively passed the Zadora, at La Puebla, and the defile formed by the heights of the river Zadora, and attacked and gained possession of the village of Sahijana de Alava, in front of the enemy's line, which he made repeated attempts to regain.

The centre of the allied army was formed by four divisions, which were destined to attack the heights on which the right of the enemy's centre was placed, while lieutenant-general sir Rowland Hill should move forward from Sahijana de Alava to attack the left. The enemy, however, having weakened his line to strengthen his detachments in the hills, abandoned his position in the valley as soon as he saw our disposition to attack it, and commenced his retreat in good order towards Vittoria; and the allied troops continued to advance notwithstanding the difficulty of the ground.

In the mean time lieutenant-general sir Thomas Graham, who commanded the left of the army, consisting of the first and fifth divisions, and generals Pack and Bradford's brigades of infantry, and generals Bock and Anson's brigades of cavalry, moved forward on Vittoria, by the high road from that town to Bilboa. He had besides with him the Spanish division under colonel Longa, and general Giron, who had been detached to the left under a different view of the state of affairs, and had afterwards arrived on the 20th at Orduna, marched that morning from thence, so as to be in the field in readiness to support lieutenant-general sir T. Graham, if his support had been required.

The enemy had a division of infantry and some cavalry advanced on the great road from Vittoria to Bilboa, resting their right on some strong heights covering the village of Gamarra Major and Abechuco were strongly occupied as tetes-du-pont to the bridges over the Zadora at these places. Brigadier-general Pack, with his Portuguese brigade, and general Longa, with the Spanish division, were directed to turn and gain the heights, supported by major-general Anson's brigade of light dragoons, and the fifth division of infantry, under the command of major-general Oswald, who was desired to take the command of all these troops.

As soon as the heights were in our possession, the village of Gamarra Major was most gallantly stormed and carried by brigadier-general Robinson's brigade of the fifth division. The enemy suffered severely, and lost three pieces of cannon. At length the enemy retreated, and the whole of the allied army co-operated in the pursuit, which was continued by all till after it was dark.

The enemy turned to the road towards Pampeluna, but were

(o) An expression in the princess of Wales's Letter to the prince regent, dated January 14, 1813;

were unable to hold any position for a sufficient length of time to allow their baggage to be drawn off. The whole, therefore, of the latter, which had not already been taken by the troops in their attack of the successive positions taken up by the enemy in their retreat from their first position on Arunez and on the Zadora, and all their ammunition and baggage, and every thing they had were taken close to Vittoria.

The army under Joseph Bonaparte consisted of the whole of the armies of the South and of the centre, and of four divisions, and all the cavalry of the army of Portugal, and some troops of the army of the North. General Foix's division of the army of Portugal was in the neighbourhood of Bilboa, and general Clausel, who commands the army of the North was near Logrono with one division of the army of Portugal, commanded by general Topin, and general Vandermasen's division of the army of the North.

The killed and wounded on both sides were immense: that of the allies is stated at seven hundred and forty officers and men, and ninety-three horses killed; and four thousand one hundred and seventy officers and men, and sixty-eight horses wounded. The loss on the part of the French could not be ascertained.

On the 24th of July a dreadful action took place between the allied army under lord Wellington and the French forces under marshal Soult, in which the number of slain on both sides was considerable. The allied army wished to gain possession of St. Sebastian, in the Pyrenees, and the French, in course, wished to relieve it. On the 25th, lord Wellington effected three breaches in the walls of St. Sebastian, two of them practicable, and the order was given for the assault. Against this, however, the French had provided, by inundating a deep trench, which separates the isthmus on which the fortress stands from the continent. This obliged the assailants to retreat. The French in their accounts of this attempt state the loss of the English to be one thousand five hundred men, while the English assert that it did not exceed five hundred, a tenth of whom were said to be officers. The Scotch Royals under major-general Hay, and the ninth regiment, were dreadful sufferers. The former advanced to the assault four hundred and twenty men, and lost in killed and wounded two hundred and ninety-eight of the number, amongst whom were the whole of the grenadiers. Lord Wellington was upon the spot during part of the assault, but was soon called away to repel Soult, who was advancing with the double purpose, of raising the siege of St. Sebastian and that of Pampeluna. On the same day that the English assaulted St. Sebastian, the French general commenced his operations by driving in some of the English out-posts, and establishing himself on the heights of Altabisca. The whole of marshal Soult's force was estimated at upwards of thirty thousand men. The English were compelled to retreat, which they did in good order, the French taking comparatively but few prisoners. Marshal Soult attacked the English with the most determined courage and impetuosity; they thrice entered the British lines, but was always beaten back. The conflict was dreadful and sanguinary, it being carried on almost solely with the musket and bayonet, scarcely a cannon shot being fired on either side. It lasted from noon till five o'clock in the evening, when the French were repulsed. The nature of the ground being entirely mountainous hindered the employment of artillery or cavalry, the effect of musketry seemed too tardy and uncertain, and the impatience for close engagement was so manifest in the troops of both armies, that the hostile bayonets were reciprocally and almost constantly plunged in the breasts of the opposing combatants. Hence the victory was dearly purchased on the part of the English, whose loss amounted to between three and four thousand men; but that of the French is estimated at a much greater number.

We shall now wind up our historical researches; but as our history would be deemed incomplete, were we to pass over in silence the improvements which have been made in the various arts and sciences, we shall conclude with a few observations on those subjects.

CHAP. VI.

Observations on the Advancement of the Arts, Sciences, and Literature, with a View of such Portions of European History, as are requisite to elucidate their particular Progress in England.

IN a former part of our work we traced the progress of society to the close of the seventeenth century. And if we examine the history of the present period, and compare it with the annals of modern Europe during any preceding century, we shall find cause to congratulate mankind on the amazing improvement in the social system; which have, with a happy conformity, diminished the miseries and multiplied the enjoyments of the human race.

After ascertaining the interests of nations, and the rights of individuals, if human reason has not been able to restrain the ambition of princes, it has at least introduced into the operations of war a spirit of generosity little known among our ferocious and sanguinary forefathers. Persecution has ceased to kindle the faggot for the trial of orthodoxy, and the good of souls, or to fertilize the earth with the blood of infidels; and the peaceful citizen has seldom been disturbed in his industrious pursuits or ingenious labours by the ravages of intestine or civil war. If the most exact regulations of police have not proved wholly effectual to suppress private violence or murder, or to banish fraud from the transactions of men, offences have certainly been rendered less frequent. Property is become more secure than it was in the days of our forefathers; and the comforts and conveniences of life are more equally enjoyed. Asylums are every where provided for the poor and indigent, and hospitals for the diseased. Private festivities are enlivened by public entertainments. The pleasures of sense, refined by delicacy, are heightened by those of imagination and sentiment; while taste, in the contemplation of the beauties of nature and art, may be said to open new sources of satisfaction and joy.

The empire of Russia, though rude and barbarous at the beginning of the eighteenth century, has made great advances towards civilization. It has experienced the most sudden and fortunate change of any country of the same extent in the history of human affairs. But that change, has not been attended with such beneficial consequences as might have been wished to the body of the people, whom Peter I. found and left in a state of slavery; and notwithstanding the more generous policy of Catharine II. who endeavoured to revive a spirit of liberty among the lower classes, and extended encouragement and protection to her subjects of all degrees, the liberal and ingenious arts of Russia have been hitherto cultivated chiefly by foreigners; or by such natives as have been initiated in them abroad, and with whom they die. They are still in some measure exotics in that great and flourishing empire; not as the abbé Raynal insinuates, on account of the coldness of the climate, but because the mental soil is not yet sufficiently prepared for their reception. The influence of example, however, daily extends itself. Many of the Russian nobility and gentry have acquired a relish for polite literature, and are distinguished by humanity to their vassals, by polished manners, and elegant conversation. Russia has already produced generals and statesmen, and will probably give birth to poets, painters, historians, and philosophers; who collect in their train the whole circle of the arts and sciences.

Of the progress of improvement in Poland, where, besides other adverse circumstances, the feudal aristocracy still reigns, though not in all its austerity, the people are slaves, and the nobles tyrants, little can be said. Sweden and Denmark have lost much of their consequence, as kingdoms; but the sons of the north do not appear to be less happy, though they seem to have lost with their political freedom, their ancient spirit of liberty and independence. They enjoy more equally the means of a comfortable subsistence. Manufactures, commerce, and agriculture, have made considerable progress among them; and it may be generally asserted, That every people, taken collectively, are happy in proportion to their industry. Nor are these countries without their men of genius and science. Sweden, in her Linnæus, boasts the honour of having given birth to the most profound naturalist of the present age.

Germany, during the period under review, has perhaps undergone undergone less change than any other country of equal extent, in these particulars, notwithstanding the frequent wars by which it has been shaken, curtailed, and divided. Agriculture, manufactures, and the mechanical arts, have in the course of the last century made great progress in many parts of that empire.

The Swiss, so much distinguished by their integrity, their love of liberty and of their country, and so long accustomed to sell their blood to the different powers of Europe, as other nations do the produce of their soil, having fertilized with culture their barren mountains, and acquired a knowledge of the necessary arts, poured forth their surplus of population upon more wealthy states, in useful artificers and industrious manufacturers; and preserved at home their plain and simple manners, with their ancient independency and military character. Happy without wealth, they were strangers to luxury. Domestic duties among them supplied the place of public amusements, and public virtue concealed the defects of other matters. Till the annexation of their country to France, the Swiss possessed all the patriotic qualities that gave birth to their republic: while the Dutch, formerly as zealous in the cause of freedom, who acquired its full establishment by greater efforts, and exhibited to mankind for a century the most perfect picture of a flourishing commonwealth, are amazingly sunk; they are become dead to every sense of a public interest, and to every generous sentiment of the soul. The lust of gain has extinguished among them the spirit of patriotism, the love of glory, and the feelings of humanity. Avarice seems to be the ruling passion, and wealth the only merit in the United Provinces, now annexed to the French empire. In such a country the liberal arts must decline, and elegant manners cannot be expected.

If painting and architecture have continued to decline in Italy, music and poetry have greatly flourished in this classical country. Metastasio, perhaps inferior to none of her modern bards, has perfected her serious musical drama. But the Italian opera has been represented by some as unnatural and fantastical. All our fine old ballads, which so exquisitely paint the tender passions, are supposed to be sung by persons under the immediate influence of those passions; and if the stage be allowed to be a picture of life, there can be nothing unnatural in an actor's imitating on it, what is believed to have happened in the great theatre of the world. To do as little violence as possible to probability, Metastasio has contrived to throw chiefly into airs or odes, those parts of the musical tragedies, that would otherwise evaporate in soliloquy, in fond complainings, or in frantic ravings. The lyric measure is admirably adapted to the language of passion; and surely that person cannot possess a musical ear who should prefer simple articulation to such enchanting melody, as generally communicates to the heart the soul-dissolving airs of this delightful poet.

The state of society in Spain was greatly improved under the princes of the house of Bourbon. The ladies are no longer excluded from company by an illiberal jealousy; and the intercourse of the sexes becomes daily more general and easy. A taste for agriculture, for arts, manufactures, and even a passion for letters, was revived among the Spaniards; and a similar taste extended itself to the neighbouring kingdom of Portugal, after the expulsion of the Jesuits. But, alas! since the commencement of the present war in the Peninsula, arts, sciences, and literature have greatly fallen back, and should even a peace take place, it will be many years before the inhabitants of those countries can possibly make up for their loss of time.

In France, society attained its highest polish before the commencement of the last century. But the misfortunes which clouded the latter years of Louis XIV. threw a gloom over the manners of the people, and a mystical religion became fashionable at court. The fervour spread, especially among the softer sex; and Racine, complying with the prevailing taste, wrote tragedies on sacred subjects. The court, however, resumed its gaiety under the regency of the duke of Orleans; and his libertine example, with that of his minister, the cardinal du Bois, introduced a total corruption of manners; a gross sensuality that scorned the veil of decency; an unprincipled levity that treated every thing sacred and respectable with derision; and a spirit of dissipation, with extreme poverty, prevailed during a considerable part of the reign of Louis XV.

The Jesuits, the chief supporters of the bull Unigenitus, having rendered themselves odious by their share in the conspiracy against the life of the king of Portugal, fell in France under the lash of the civil power, for certain fraudulent mercantile transactions. They refused to discharge the debts of one of their body, who had become bankrupt for a large sum, and who was supposed to act for the benefit of the whole society. As a monk, indeed, he was obliged to do so. The parliaments eagerly seized an opportunity of humbling their spiritual enemies. The Jesuits were every where cited before those high tribunals, in 1761, and ordered to do justice to their creditors. They pretended to acquiesce in the decision, but delayed payment under various pretences. New suits were commenced against them, in 1762, on account of the pernicious tendency of their writings. In the course of these proceedings, they were compelled to produce their Institute, or the rules of their order, hitherto studiously concealed. That mysterious volume, which was found to consist of maxims subversive of all civil government, and even of the fundamental principle of morals, completed their ruin. All their colleges were seized, all their goods confiscated; and the king, ashamed or afraid to protect them, resigned them to their fate, and finally expelled them the kingdom, by a solemn edict, and utterly abolished the order of Jesuits in France.

An account of the revolution in France, which first expelled the Bourbon family, and successively elevated Napoleon Bonaparte to the premier consulate, and afterwards elected him emperor of the French, is particularly related in our annals of the reign of George the Third.

Many poets appeared in Britain within the time comprehended in our present survey. We have already mentioned Pope; his friend Gay not only distinguished himself as a fabulist, but acquired much applause by the vivacity and humour of the Beggar's Opera.

Born with a strong understanding, a benevolent heart, and an enthusiastic fancy—with all the powers necessary to form a great poet, James Thomson perceived that Pope had attained the summit of excellence in that mode of composition which he had adopted. He perceived there were other paths to fame which Pope had not pursued; and by making choice of blank verse, which was suited to the exuberance of his genius, to the grandeur of his conceptions, and to the boldness of his metaphorical images, as well as to the minute wildness of his poetical descriptions, he has left us in his Seasons, a greater number of just, beautiful, and sublime views of external nature, than are to be found in the productions of any of the poets since the days of Lucretius. The Seasons are characterised by elegant and accurate description.

But none of our lyric poets have so well imitated the philosophic good humour and good sense of Horace, as Akenside. Nothing can be more happily pursued than the whole train of thinking in his Ode on the Winter Solstice.

Akenside, susceptible to all the impressions of natural and moral beauty, who surveyed the universe with a benevolent eye, and a heart filled with admiration and love of the wisdom and goodness of the Supreme Being, has given us in his Pleasures of Imagination, a delightful system of the philosophy of taste, in all the pomp of Miltonic verse. The Pleasures of Imagination, his principal work, was first published in 1744, when he had not attained his twenty-third year. He was bred a physician, and died physician to the queen, June 23, 1770. The Pindaric Odes of this poet have great dignity in elevation of sentiment and elegance of diction.

Armstrong, like Akenside, a physician by profession, took his degree in 1732, but never arrived at much practice. He has bequeathed to mankind a valuable legacy, in his Art of preserving Health, while he has furnished the literary world with a more classical poem, in the same species of versification, than either the Seasons or the Pleasures of Imagination. Among his other poems, we may mention his Œconomy of Love, a piece of great merit, but too strongly tinctured with the licentiousness of Ovid.

Akenside and Armstrong may be classed together, not only as being both physicians, but as resembling each other in their taste for poetical composition.

There were many other poets and dramatic writers, whose works are deservedly held in estimation.

INDEX.

INDEX

TO THE FIRST VOLUME.

AGINCOURT, battle of, 266

Alfred ascends the throne of England, 38—Greatly harrassed by the Danes, ib.—Enters the Danish camp in the character of a minstrel, reconnoitres them, and obtains a compleat victory over them, 39—Spares the lives of the Danes, and settles them in England, 40—After rebuilding London, establishes a militia for the defence of the kingdom, ib.—Defeats the Danes in several engagements, ib.—Death of Alfred, 41—Character of Alfred, ib.

America, discovery of North, 346

Arteville, massacre of James d', 202

Arts, Sciences, and Literature, progress of in England, 243

Athelstan ascends the throne, 44—Overthrew the Danes, and compelled the Welsh to pay tribute to him, 45—His death, ib.

Baliol, John, king of Scotland, taken prisoner, and committed to the Tower, 171

Becket, Thomas à, a prelate of great haughtiness, 102—To ingratiate himself with the pope, he resigned the see of Canterbury into his hands, 106—After being sent out of the kingdom he is permitted to return, 107—Reconciled to king Henry, ib.—Proceeds to take possession of his diocese like a conqueror, 108—Murdered in Canterbury cathedral, ib.—His assassins retire to Yorkshire, afterwards to Rome, and are ordered to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, 109—Miracles said to be wrought by him after his death, ib. note

Berwick and Roxborough surrendered to the English, 115

Bolingbroke, Henry de, duke of Lancaster, seeks the recovery of his dukedom, 228—Ascends the throne of England by the title of Henry IV. 257

Breakspear, Nicolas, afterwards pope Adrian IV. life of, 241

Britain, origin of its name, 5—Original inhabitants of, ib.—Their chief commerce was with the Phœnician merchants, 7

Bruce, Robert, determines to rescue his country from the English yoke, 178—Acknowledged king of Scotland, 192

Cæsar, Julius, entertains the design of conquering Britain, 7—Lands at Ritupæ, ib.—Description of his landing, 8—Makes peace with the Britons, and returns to Gaul, ib.—Lands again, reconquers the Britons, and returns to Gaul, ib.

Calais taken by Edward III. 206

Canute ravages the eastern coast of England, 52—Obtains possession of the English throne, 53—Puts several English nobles to death, ib.—Conquers Norway, 54—His death, ib.

Caractacus, a British prince, carried to Rome in triumph, 9—Released from bondage, ib.

Chalons, Edward I. engages in a tournament at, which is attended with serious consequences, 161

Christ's Hospital London, founded by Edward VI. 431

Church, history of, 12, 30, 64, 95, 232, 293, 325

Church, affairs of, and progressive history of the Reformation, 406

Clarendon, disputes concerning the constitutions of, 107

Clergy, usurpations of the, enormous in England, 102

Commerce of England, observations on, 545

Constantine, supposed to have been born at Colchester, 11—Divided Britain into three provinces, ib.

Crecy, battle of, 204

Crusade, plan for one, to oppose the Mohammedans, 77

Crusaders take the city of Jerusalem, and commit dreadful cruelties, 81

Danes, Ethelred dies of a wound he received in an action with, 38—Alfred gains a victory over the Danes, 39—England infested by the Danes, 41—The Danes overthrown by Athelstan, 45—Edmund conquers the Danes, ib.—The Northumbrian Danes conquered by Edred, 46—The Danes invade England under Sweyn king of Denmark and Olave king of Norway, 50—The English become tributary to the Danes, ib.—Massacre of the Danes, 51—The Danes obtain possession of England, 53

Druidism, the religion of the ancient Britons, 6

Dunstan, an overbearing ecclesiastic, practises many artifices in favour of the monks, 48, et aliis locis.—His death, 65, n.

East-Anglia, kingdom of, founded by Uffa, 25

Ecclesiastical history, 551

Edgar succeeds to the throne, 47—An abominable libertine, 48—Edgar orders the isle of Thanet to be pillaged and laid waste, ib.

Edmund succeeds to the throne, 45—The Danes renew hostilities, and Edmund conquers them, ib.—Murdered by Leolf, ib.

Edmund Ironside ascends the throne, 52—Dreadful battle between Edmund and Canute, ib.—Barbarously murdered, 53

Edred ascends the throne, 45—Conquers the Northumbrian Danes, ib.—His death, 46

Edward the Elder succeeds to the throne of England, 41—England still infested by the Danes, ib—His death, 42

Edward the Martyr accedes to the throne, 48—Murdered by order of his mother Elfrida, 49

Edward the Confessor ascends the throne, 55—Earl Godwin makes war upon the king, 56—Edward banishes earl Godwin, 58—Restores him to his power and fortune, ib.—The Welsh infest the western borders of England, 59—Edward's death, ib.

Edward I. son of Henry III. absent from England when his father died, 161—Concludes a truce with the sultan of Babylon, and sails for England, ib—Does homage to Philip king of France, for the dominions he held in that kingdom, ib.—Lands at Dover, and was crowned seventeen days after his arrival, ib.—Applies himself to the correction of abuses which had crept into the government, ib.—Extirpates all bands and confederacies of robbers, 162—Banishes fifteen thousand Jews from the kingdom, ib.—Engages in a war against the Welsh, ib.—Compels Llewellyn to become tributary to him, 163—Again enters on a war with the Welsh, ib.—Llewellyn slain in battle, and Wales completely conquered, ib.—Calls his son Edward Prince of Wales, ib.—Goes to France to settle the differences on the continent, ib.—On his return to England, corrects the abuses which had crept in during his absence, ib.—Fines and deposes the judges for corruption, 164—Lays claim to the sovereignty of Scotland, ib.—Settles the succession to the Scottish throne, 166—Enters on a war with France, ib.—The French take and burn Dover, 167—Observations on the constitution and origin of parliament, ib.—Enters on a war with Scotland, and takes John Baliol its king, whom he commits prisoner to the Tower, 171—Makes an attempt to recover Guienne, ib.—Confirms the Great Charter, 173—War with Scotland, 174—William Wallace discomfits the English forces, putting many of them to the sword, ib.—Wallace revered as the deliverer of the Scots from the thraldom of the English, 175—Edward gains advantages over the Scots, but is at length obliged to retire, ib.—In a parliament at London, Edward confirmed the Great Charter and the Charter of the Forests, 176—Pope Boniface claims the authority of being liege lord of Scotland, ib.—Edward re-enters Scotland, but signs a truce with the Scots in the winter, 177—Again prepares for the conquest of Scotland, which at last he effects, but deems his conquest insecure while Wallace remained alive, ib.—William Wallace is soon after executed as a traitor, ib.—Robert Bruce determines to rescue his country from the English yoke, 178—Edward dies at Carlisle, on his march to Scotland, 179—Enjoins his son to prosecute the enterprize, and not to desist till he had conquered the country, ib.—Edward's character, ib.

Edward II. ascends the throne, 180—Receives the homage of some of the Scottish barons, ib.—Piers Gavaston, a favourite of Edward, gives cause of disgust to the English barons, 181—Edward determines to go to France, to do homage for the duchy of Guienne, ib.—Marries the princess Isabella, ib.—Gavaston banished the kingdom, ib.—Edward recalls Gavaston, ib.—The barons murmur thereat, 182—Gavaston again banished, ib.—Edward again recalled Gavaston, but the earl of Lancaster marching after him with an army, obliges Edward to fly by sea with his favourite, ib.—Gavaston taken prisoner and beheaded, 183—Edward embarks for France, ib.—Edward grants a truce to Scotland, and Robert Bruce strengthens himself in that kingdom, ib.—Edward marches against the Scots, and is obliged to retreat, ib.—The earl of Lancaster levies an army against the king, 184—The power of the earl of Lancaster bears down all opposition, 185—Edward lays siege to Berwick, which he afterwards raises, ib.—Makes peaceable overtures to Bruce, and a truce is concluded on, ib.—Makes a confidant of Hugh le Despenser, who advised the king to act with unbecoming severity, ib.—The king orders the two Despensers to be banished, ib.—Edward marches against the earl of Lancaster, and overcomes his army, 186—The earl of Lancaster taken prisoner, and beheaded, ib.—All his efforts unequal to the hostile conspiracies forming against him, 187—His queen Isabella at the head of a conspiracy against him, ib.—The bishop of Exeter seized and beheaded, ib.—The elder Despenser delivered up to his enemies, and hanged, ib.—The king taken, and confined in the castle of Kenilworth, ib.—The younger Despenser taken and put to death, 188—Edward required to resign his crown, which he assents to, ib.—Edward cruelly put to death, ib.—His character, ib.

Edward III. ascends the throne, 190—The city of London obtained an enlargement of its privileges, and the right of extending its jurisdiction over the borough of Southwark, 191—War with Scotland, ib.—The Scots make great devastations, and the king is unable to force them to a battle, ib.—Robert Bruce acknowledged independent sovereign of Scotland, 192—Mortimer, the queen's paramour gets possession of the estates of many of the nobles, ib.—Mortimer condemned as a traitor and hanged, 193—The queen Isabella degraded, ib.—Edward takes measures to rid the country of robbers, ib.

ib.—Plan for placing Edward Baliol on the throne of Scotland, ib.—War carried into Scotland, 194—The English at first successful against the Scots, ib.—Edward Baliol seated by Edward III. on the throne of Scotland, 195—Baliol shortly after deprived of his kingdom, ib.—Observations on the Salian Code, the law of an ancient tribe among the Franks, ib.—Edward makes great preparations for a war with France, which proves abortive, 197—Gains a great naval victory over the French, 198—Edward lays siege to Tournay, which he raises, and enters on a truce with the French, 199—Edward obliged to make his escape by stealth into England, ib.—Quarrels with John Stratford, archbishop of Canterbury, to whom he is afterwards reconciled, ib.—Count Montfort makes war with Charles de Blois, 200—Montfort is taken prisoner, 201—Heroic conduct of the countess of Montfort, ib.—Edward sends succours to the countess of Montfort, ib.—Edward goes to France with a large army, where, by undertaking too many sieges at the same time, he fails in all his enterprizes, ib.—Edward negociates a truce, ib.—On which a treaty followed, 202—Returns to England, ib.—Edward renews the war with France, and obtains a victory over the French at Aubroche, 202—John de Montfort escapes from prison, ib.—Massacre of James d'Arteville, a brewer of Ghent, ib.—Edward embarks for France with a large army, carrying with him his son Edward the Black Prince, 203—Gains great victories over the French, ib.—The battle of Crecy, in which the English are victorious, 204—The English are successful against the Scotch at Neville's Cross, 205—Takes the king of Scotland prisoner, ib.—Takes the town of Calais, 206—Origin of the motto, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," 207—Pestilence in London, ib.—Edward again embarks for France, and obtains various successes, 208—The Scots surprize Berwick, ib.—Baliol resigns to Edward his pretensions to the crown of Scotland, and receives a pension, 209—Battle of Poictiers, where Edward prince of Wales takes John king of France prisoner, ib.—Conducts the king of France to London, 212—Peace with France, ib.—Death of the prince of Wales, 216—Death of Edward III. ib.—His character, ib.

Edward IV. (duke of York,) ascends the throne, 297—Great numbers of the Lancastrian party executed, ib.—Henry's queen, Margaret, assembles an army in Yorkshire, ib.—Battle of Touton, in which the Yorkists are victorious, ib.—Henry and his queen retire to Scotland, 298—The parliament pass an act of forfeiture and attainder against Henry VI. and queen Margaret, ib.—Which act was extended to many noblemen and gentlemen, ib.—Margaret again assembles an army, and obtains some advantages, but is at length overcome, and again retires northward, 299—Queen Margaret protected by a robber, ib.—Henry VI. taken and committed to the Tower, ib.—Marries the widow of sir John Gray of Groby, ib.—Cruel treatment of Henry VI. 300—Coolness between Edward and the earl of Warwick, ib.—Insurrection in Yorkshire, 301—The earl of Warwick goes as an exile to Calais, and thence to Normandy, 303—Enters on a plan for the dethronement of Edward IV. ib.—The earl lands in England, levies forces against the king, 304—Edward flies from his army and embarks for the continent, ib.—The earl of Warwick releases king Henry from the Tower, and restores him to the throne, ib.—Edward lands with a small force at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, 305—Again assumes the title of king, ib.—Takes Henry VI. prisoner, and commits him to the Tower, 306—The earl of Warwick slain in battle at Barnet, ib.—Edward enters on a war with France, 307—Treaty with the king of France, 308—Queen Margaret released from prison, ib.—Edward accuses his brother the duke of Clarence, who is condemned, and privately put to death in the Tower, 309—Death of Edward IV. 310—His character, ib.

Edward V. ascends the throne, 311—Violent proceedings of the duke of Gloucester, 312—Lord Hastings murdered, 313—Jane Shore compelled to do penance at St. Paul's, ib.—Edward V. dethroned, and Richard III. proclaimed, 314—Murdered with his brother, in the Tower, 315.

Edward VI. succeeds his father Henry VIII. 418—Enumeration of the regents during the minority of Edward, ib.—Disagreements among the members of the regency, 419—The protestant religion confirmed, ib.—Images in churches ordered to be taken down and destroyed, ib.—Edward Seymour, earl of Hereford, and protector of the realm, advanced to the dukedom of Somerset, 420—The duke of Somerset beheaded, ib.—An English Liturgy or Common Prayer established to be used in churches, 421—Gardiner, a Catholic bishop, endeavours to obstruct the Reformation, 422—Joan Bocher condemned as a heretic, and committed to the flames, 423—Van Paris, a Dutchman, burned for being an Arian, ib.—Insurrection in Devonshire, 424—The insurrection suppressed, and the ringleaders executed, ib.—Insurrection in Norfolk, under one Ket, a tanner, 424—Ket taken and hanged at Norwich, ib.—The duke of Somerset committed to the Tower, 426—The duke of Somerset beheaded on Tower Hill, 429—The duke of Northumberland endeavours to persuade the king to set aside the succession of his sisters Mary and Elizabeth, 430—The king has first the measles, then the small pox, but recovers from both, ib.—Falls into a consumption, 431—Persuaded by the earl of Northumberland to set aside the succession of Mary and Elizabeth, in favour of Lady Jane Grey, ib.—Death of Edward, ib.—His character, ib.—

Edwy ascends the throne, and has a short but turbulent reign, 46—His queen basely maltreated, ib.—Dethroned, ib.—His queen murdered, 47—His death, ib.

Egbert, fist monarch of England, 36—Defeats the Danes, 37—His death, ib.

Elizabeth ascends the throne, 449—First acts of her reign, 450—Protestantism re-established in England, ib.—Particulars of the Reformation in Scotland, 453—Elizabeth sends reinforcements to assist the reformers in Scotland, 456—A law passed in Scotland for abolishing the papal jurisdiction, 457—Mary queen of Scots refuses to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, 458—John Knox preaches in favour of the reformation in Scotland, 459—Mary queen of Scots becomes enamoured of lord Robert Darnley, 461—Proposal for declaring Mary queen of England, ib.—Persecution and massacre of the Hugonots in France, 463—Mary queen of Scots marries lord Darnley, 467—David Rizzio assassinated in the presence of Mary queen of Scots, 469—Henry lord Darnley suddenly taken ill, supposed to be from poison, 470—Henry lord Darnley's house blown up, and his dead body found in a neighbouring field, ib.—The earl of Bothwel charged with the murder of Darnley, brought to trial, and acquitted, 471—Bothwel seizes Mary's person, and she willingly remains with him, ib.—Queen Mary marries Bothwel, 472—Queen Mary escapes from Scotland, 474—Queen Mary lands in England, ib.—A new translation of the Bible published, 476—Rise of the Puritans, ib.—Insurrections in England, ib.—Puritans endeavour to reform religion, 484—Elizabeth takes a part in the affairs of the Netherlands, 485—The duke of Alva flatters Mary with being restored to liberty and her throne, 486—Execution of the duke of Norfolk, 487—The queen of Scots enters into various intrigues, ib.—The Hugonots massacred on the eve of St. Bartholomew, 488—Insurrection of the catholics in Ireland, 493—Plan to assassinate Elizabeth and liberate Mary, 503—The conspiracy discovered, 504—Mary's papers seized, and sent to the council, ib.—Resolution to bring Mary to trial, ib.—Mary appears before commissioners at Fotheringay castle, 505—Mary brought to trial, and being found guilty, sentence of death is pronounced against her, 506—The warrant for her execution read to Mary, 509—Mary queen of Scots executed, 511—Hearing that Philip king of Spain was preparing a large naval force to attack England, Elizabeth sent sir Francis Drake with a fleet to intercept his supplies, 513—Sir Francis Drake takes and destroys a vast number of ships, ib.—The Spanish navy destined to invade England denominated the INVINCIBLE ARMADA, 514—Measures taken to counteract the Spanish armament, ib.—The queen appears on horseback in the camp at Tilbury, 515—The armada sails for England, 516—The English fleet under admiral Effingham attacks the Spanish armada, and entirely destroys it, 517—The duke of Guise and his brother assassinated, 520—The king of France assassinated, ib.—Disputes with the Puritans, 521—Successes against the Spanish settlements in America, 524—The English take Cadiz, ib.—Affairs of Ireland, 527—The earl of Essex sent on an expedition against the Irish rebels, 529—Elizabeth displeased with Essex's conduct, 530—Elizabeth orders Essex to remain in Ireland till further orders, but he hastily returns to England, ib.—The queen orders Essex into custody, but afterwards liberates him, ib.—Essex again taken into custody, and conducted to the Tower, 533—Essex brought to trial, and sentenced to death, 534—The earl of Essex privately executed, ib.—Cuffe, Davers, Blount, and Merie, Essex's partizans, condemned and executed, 535—Successes of the English against the Irish rebels, 536—Elizabeth discovering that Essex had confided a ring to the countess of Nottingham, to deliver to her majesty, became inexorable, and died, 538—Elizabeth's character, ib.

English, observations on their progress towards civilization, 319

Essex, kingdom of, founded by Erchenwin, 23

Ethelbald and Ethelbert jointly reign in England, 38

Ethelred ascends the throne of England, 38—Dies of a wound he received in an action with the Danes, ib.

Ethelred ascends the throne, 49—The Danes invade England under Sweyn king of Denmark and Olave king of Norway, 50—The English become tributary to the Danes, ib.—The massacre of the Danes, 51—Sweyn again invades England, and again retires to Denmark, leaving his son Canute in charge of his forces, ib.—Canute ravages the coast of England, 52—Ethelred's death, ib.

Ethelwulf, king, makes a partition of his dominions, 37—Makes profuse grants to the church, ib.

Feudal Laws, the introduction of, attributed to William the Conqueror, 69

Feudal and Anglo-Norman government and manners, dissertation on, 247

Gournay and Mautravers, the murderers of Edward II. 188—Gournay beheaded at sea, ib.—Mautravers afterwards received a pardon, ib.

Government of England, observations on, 539

Hales, sir Robert, treasurer, murdered, 221

Hardicanute ascends the throne, 55—His death, ib.

Harold I. surnamed Harefoot, ascends the throne 54—His death, 55

Harold II. accedes to the throne, 60—Slain by an arrow at the battle of Hastings, 63

Hastings in Sussex, battle of, 63

Henry I. ascends the throne, 80—Grants a charter charter of privileges to the people, 81—Condemns several noblemen who were his elder brother Robert's adherents, and confiscates their estates, 83—Takes his brother prisoner, and conquers Normandy, ib.—Involved in hostilities with Louis le Gros, king of France, 85—Barons of Normandy revolt from Henry, 87—Discontents in England, 86—Death of king Henry, 89—His character, ib.

Henry II. ascends the throne, 99—Crowned at Westminster, 100—Revokes the grants made by his predecessor, 101—Grants a charter of liberties, ib.—The Welsh make inroads in England, but are reduced to submission, ib.—The usurpations of the clergy enormous in England, 102—Henry's situation very unhappy, by reason of the encroachments of the papal power, 107—Invades the territories of the count of Auvergne, ib.—Allows Becket to return to England, ib.—Reconciled to Becket; and held the stirrup while the haughty prelate mounted his horse, ib.—Disputes concerning the Constitutions of Clarendon, ib.—Henry endeavours to reconcile himself to the pope after Thomas à Becket's murder, 109—Undertakes an expedition against Ireland, 110—Declares upon oath, that he was not concerned in the murder of Thomas à Becket, 112—Conquers Ireland, ib.—Troubled by, and at war with, his family, ib.—Makes proposals to his sons, 113—The king of Scotland makes an irruption into Northumberland, but is opposed by Richard de Lucy, who compels the Scottish king to retire within his own borders, 114—Henry II. arrives in England, and repairs to Canterbury to make his submissions to the ashes of Thomas à Becket, ib.—Walks barefoot, and prostrates himself before the shrine of that prelate, ib.—Victorious over his enemies, ib.—Compels the Scots to surrender Berwick and Roxborough, 115—Makes several beneficial regulations in the criminal laws, ib.—Divides England into four circuits, and appoints itinerant justices to try causes in their respective circuits, ib.—His son Henry requests his forgiveness for the crimes he had committed against him, 116—Is reconciled to his son Henry, ib.—His son Henry died, at which he is greatly afflicted, ib.—Grants the county of Huntingdon to the king of Scotland, ib.—Treats the Irish chieftains with scorn and derision, ib.—Progress of the crusade, 117—Goes to war with France and his son Henry, ib.—Accepts disadvantageous terms of accommodation, 118—Death of Henry II. ib.—His character, ib.

Henry III. ascends the throne, 142—Henry being an infant, the earl of Pembroke was appointed Protector, ib.—Louis, son to the king of France, has the mortification to find that most of the barons desert his cause, 143—Louis makes peace with the Protector, and evacuates the kingdom, ib.—Commotions in different parts of the kingdom, 144—War between Henry and the king of France, 145—Henry III. greatly attached to strangers, ib.—The earl of Pembroke openly declares his sentiments on the partiality shewn to foreigners, ib.—The barons refuse to attend the parliament, ib.—The earl of Pembroke treacherously murdered in Ireland, by the contrivance of the bishop of Winchester, 146—The pope engages Henry to attempt the conquest of Naples, 147—Violates the Great Charter, ib.—Swears to maintain the Great Charter inviolate, 149—Twenty-four barons appointed to draw up a detail of grievances, 151—The barons publish the Statutes of Oxford, which annihilate the prerogatives of monarchy, 152—The kingdom involved in great confusion, 153—Disputes between the king and the earl of Leicester, ib.—Llewellyn, prince of Wales has recourse to the protection of Henry, 154—Cruelties exercised against the Jews, ib.—The king makes his peace with the barons, ib.—Battle between the king's forces and the rebel army, ib.—King Henry and the king of the Romans taken prisoners, 156—The earl of Leicester usurps the sovereign power, and calls a parliament to meet at London, 157—From this parliament the English House of Commons is supposed to have derived its origin, ib.—Prince Edward escapes from confinement, ib.—The earl of Leicester slain, 158—The earl of Gloucester levies troops with a view to act against the king, ib.—The king reduces his English subjects to obedience, 159—Convokes a parliament at Northampton, in which the pope's legate announces a crusade, ib.—Holds a parliament at Marlborough, in which are enacted the Statutes of Marlborough, ib.—Prince Edward engages in the crusade, ib.—Death of Henry III. ib.—His character, 160—Laws passed in the reign of Henry, ib.

Henry IV. ascends the throne, 257—Insurrection against the king's authority, ib.—Several noblemen and gentlemen executed, 258—William Sautré burned for heresy, ib.—Owen Glendowr revolts, ib.—Glendowr makes great progress against the king's forces, 259—Death of Owen Glendowr, 260—Death of Henry IV. 262—His character, ib.

Henry V. ascends the throne, 262—Magnanimous behaviour of Judge Gascoigne, 263—Persecutes the Lollards, ib.—Sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham, condemned to be burnt as a heretic, ib.—Makes his escape from prison, ib.—Lord Cobham assembles a few forces, but is taken, and afterwards burnt, 264—War with France, ib.—Rigorous measures adopted for the suppression of a conspiracy, 265—The battle of Azincour, 266—Troubles in France, 267—Henry lands in Normandy, ib.—Espouses the princess Catherine, 268—Death of Henry V. 270—His character, ib.—Revenues, &c. in the time of Henry V.

Henry VI. succeeds to the throne at the age of nine months, 271—The English again attempt the conquest of France, ib.—The king of Scots restored, 272—The battle of Orleans, (called the battle of Herrings,) 274—Joan of Arc, commonly called the Maid of Orleans, appears at the French court, and promises to raise the siege of Orleans, 275—The English retire from before Orleans, 276—Charles, king of France, marches to Rheims, and is there crowned, 277—Many places submit to Charles, ib.—The English greatly discomfited, ib.—Henry VI. lands at Calais, 278—The Maid of Orleans taken prisoner, ib.—and burnt alive at Rouen, 279—Roger Bolingbroke, a mathematician, condemned for a magician, and executed at Tyburn, 282—Margery Gourdimain, a female vendor of love-powders, burnt in Smithfield, ib.—A truce with France, ib.—The duke of Gloucester arrested, and soon after found dead in his bed, 283—His estates confiscated, ib.—Various cruelties exercised, ib.—The French every where successful against the English, 284—The duke of Suffolk seized and beheaded at sea, 285—Insurrections in England, under Jack Cade, ib.—The insurgents rout a detachment of the king's troops, 286—Jack Cade seizes lord Say and Seale, and his son-in-law sir James Cromer, who are beheaded, ib.—Jack Cade taken and beheaded, ib.—Richard duke of York aspires to the crown, 287—The English driven out of France, 289—The duke of Somerset arrested and sent to the Tower, but soon released, 290—The duke of York raises an army, and marches towards the metropolis, ib.—The royalists defeated at St. Alban's, ib.—The king wounded, and conducted to London, ib.—The royalists defeated at Northampton, 291—Henry again taken prisoner, ib. The duke of York slain in an action against the forces under queen Margaret, 292—Several nobles put to death, ib.—Margaret obtains a victory over the Yorkists, and the king is retaken by his own party, ib.—Edward duke of York enters London, ib.—Henry VI. dethroned, 293—Edward proclaimed king at London, ib.—Committed to the Tower, 299—Cruelly treated, 300—Restored, 304—Again taken by Edward IV. and committed to the Tower, 306—Queen Margaret and her son taken prisoners, ib.—The queen sent to the Tower, and her son murdered, ib.—The king died in the Tower, ib.—Queen Margaret released from prison, 308

Henry, earl of Richmond, lands at Milford Haven, with a small force, 317—Henry advances to Bosworth, where Richard III. is slain, 317, 318—Ascends the throne under the title of Henry VII. 326—The two contending houses of York and Lancaster united by Henry's marriage, 327 Suppresses an insurrection, 329—Lambert Simnel personates Richard duke of York, who was murdered, ib.—Simnel proclaimed at Dublin, 330—Simnel taken prisoner, pardoned, and made a scullion in the king's kitchen, ib.—Troubles in France, 331—Henry takes part in the war, 334—Makes peace with France, 335—Perkin Warbec, origin of, ib.—Perkin Warbec personates Richard duke of York, 336—Perkin Warbec lands in England, 337—Many of his partizans taken, and put to death, ib.—Repulsed from the coast of Kent, Perkin retired to Flanders, 338—Perkin lands in Scotland, and is favourably received by the Scottish king, ib.—Perkin retires out of the kingdom, ib.—Insurrection in the West of England, 339—The rebel forces overcome in the neighbourhood of London, ib.—Henry demands that Perkin be delivered up to him, 340—Perkin takes on him the appellation of Richard the Fourth, ib.—Lady Catharine Gordon, Perkin Warbec's wife, taken prisoner in Cornwall, ib.—Perkin persuaded to deliver himself into the king's hands, ib.—Perkin's life granted him, and he is confined in the Tower, ib.—Perkin enters on a plan to effect his escape, 341—Perkin is arraigned, condemned, and executed at Tyburn, ib.—The king's eldest daughter Margaret, married to James king of Scotland, ib.—Employs two ministers (Empson and Dudley) to second his rapacious views, 342—Requests the king of Castile to deliver into his hands Edmund de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, 343—Commits the duke of Suffolk to the Tower, ib.—His death and character, ib.

Henry VIII. ascends the throne, 347—Empson and Dudley attainted, found guilty, and executed, 348—Henry marries Catherine, infanta of Spain, ib.—Henry advanced Thomas Wolsey, dean of Lincoln, to the office of prime minister, 351—Early life of Wolsey, ib. n. Makes an expedition to France, 352—Battle of Guinegâte, commonly called the Battle of Spurs, ib.—Henry takes Tournay, and bestows the see on Wolsey, ib.—Battle of Flouden, in which the English are successful, 353—Makes peace with Scotland, ib.—Peace with France, 354—Wolsey made archbishop of York, ib.—Affairs of Scotland, 355 Wolsey appointed the pope's legate with extraordinary powers, 357—Francis king of France solicits an interview with Henry near Calais, 358—Account of the interview, ib.—The duke of Buckingham executed, 359—Troubles in the church, ib.—The pope publishes the sale of indulgences, 360—Martin Luther preaches against indulgences, ib.—Henry writes a book against Luther, and obtains the title of Defender of the Faith, 361—Henry declares war against France, 362—Affairs of Scotland, ib.—Wolsey aspires to the papacy, 363—An insurrection in several places, 366—The insurgents pardoned, ib.—Cardinal Wolsey builds Hampton Court, which he presents to the king, 367—Pretends that his marriage with Catherine was unlawful, 369—Enamoured of Anne Boleyn, ib.—Obtains a divorce from queen Catherine, 370—Cardinal Wolsey ordered to retire from court, 372—Henry marries Anne Boleyn, 376—Dr. Cranmer created archbishop bishop of Canterbury, ib.—Subjects the monasteries to a visitation, 378—Establishes his own supremacy, ib.—Cranmer adopts the protestant tenets, 379—Elizabeth Barton, practises impostures, 380—John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, is beheaded, ib.—Sir T. More beheaded, 381—Queen Catherine's death, ib. Entertains the idea of abolishing the monasteries, 382—Anne Boleyn loses the king's favour, 383—Jane Seymour obtains an ascendant over Henry, ib.—Anne Boleyn sent to the Tower, ib.—The queen Anne Boleyn, and her brother the viscount Rocheford beheaded, 384—The king marries Jane Seymour, ib.—Insurrections on account of the king's innovations, 386—The insurrections suppressed, ib.—Death of queen Jane Seymour, 387—Establishes Protestantism, 388—Proposals for espousing Anne of Cleves, the lady comes to England, and Henry espouses Anne of Cleves, ib.—Obtains a divorce, 390—Fixes his affection on Catherine Howard, niece to the duke of Norfolk, ib.—Commits Thomas Cromwell to the Tower, ib.—Cromwell beheaded, ib.—Marries Catherine Howard, 391—Authorizes a persecution against the Protestants, ib.—Orders the countess of Salisbury to be executed, ib.—Persecutions in Scotland, 392—Catherine Howard accused of licentious manners, 393—Several persons executed for concealing Catherine Howard's frailties before marriage, ib.—The king next married Catherine Par, 396—Affairs of Scotland, ib.—Orders the litany to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue, 399—Cranmer sent to the Tower, ib.—Anne Ascue tortured for denying the real presence, ib.—Anne Ascue burned alive, 400—Catherine Par narrowly escapes a snare laid to entrap and imprison her, ib.—Orders the duke of Norfolk and his son the earl of Surrey to be arrested, ib.—The earl of Surrey executed for high treason, 401—The duke of Norfolk ordered for execution, but saved by the king's dying the night previous, ib.—Manner of the king's death, ib.—His will, ib.—His character, ib.

Heptarchy, the Saxon, united under Egbert, 28

Honorius, the Roman emperor, resigned the sovereignty of Britain, 11—The Romans finally leave Britain, ib.

Jerusalem taken by the crusaders, 81—Murderers of Thomas à Becket ordered to make a pilgrimage to, 109

Jews, cruelties exercised against, 154—Banished from England, 162

Infidels, Richard I. engages in a crusade against the, 120

John succeeds to the throne, 127—Disagreements between John and the Normans, 128—Murders his nephew Arthur, 129—The king of France obtains several victories over him, 130, 131—John's conduct exposes him to contempt, 131—Disputes between the pope and John, ib.—The pope's interdict against John, 132 John confiscates the estates of the clergy who obeyed the interdict, ib.—Excommunicated by the pope, 133 The pope's legate, requires John to resign his kingdom to the church, 134—John swears fealty and obedience to pope Innocent III. and his successors, 135—Offends the barons by his insolence, ib. Langton shewsa copy of Henry the First's charter, ib.—The barons demand a renewal of Henry the First's charter, 136—Disturbances in consequence of the barons' demand, ib.—The barons proceed to levy war upon the king, ib.—A conference takes place between the king and the barons at Runnemede near Staines, ib.—The king signs MAGNA CHARTA, ib.—John makes war upon the barons, and burns many towns, 138—The barons offer to place Louis, son of the king of France, on the throne of England, ib.—Louis lands at Sandwich, and obtains several victories over John, 139—Shewing too great a partiality to Frenchmen, Louis displeases the barons, ib.—Death of king John, ib.—His character, ib.

Ireland, Henry II. undertakes an expedition against, 110—Observations on the original peopling of Ireland, ib.—Conquered by Henry II.

Kent, kingdom of, founded by Hengist, 22

Kent, considerable damage done to the coart of, by an extraordinary inundation of the sea, 80

Lancaster, death of John of Gaunt duke of, 228—See Bolingbroke.

Learning and the Arts, progress of, 13, 548

Leicester, disputes between Henry III. and and the earl of, 153—Usurps the sovereign power, 157—Slain in battle, 158

Leolf, an outlaw, stabs Edmund king of England, 45

Liberties, Henry I. grants a charter of, 81—Confirmed by Henry II. 101

Literature, Arts, and Sciences, retrospective view of, 321

Llewellyn, prince of Wales, seeks protection from Henry III. 154—Slain in battle, 163

London Bridge built, 80

London burnt by the Danes, 37

———, great part thereof consumed by fire, 80—Pestilence in, 207

MAGNA CHARTA, the sacred basis of English liberty, signed by king John at Runnemede, 136—Copy of, 139—Violated by Henry III. 148

Manufactures, state of the English, 546

Marlborough, a parliament held at, 159

Mary I. troubles at the commencement of her reign, 432—Lady Jane Grey set up by the protestants, ib.—Lady Jane Grey proclaimed queen, ib.—Mary asserts her right to the crown, ib.—Mary joined by the catholics, and proclaimed at Norwich, 433—Lady Jane Grey deserted by her friends, returns to a private station, ib.—Several noblemen and gentlemen taken into custody, for espousing the cause of Lady Jane Grey, ib.—The duke of Northumberland executed, ib.—Lady Jane and lord Guildford found guilty of treason, ib.—The duke of Norfolk, bishops Gardiner, Tunstal. and Bonner, released from the Tower, 434—Several bishops committed to prison, ib.—Judge Hales killed himself, ib.—Cranmer thrown into prison, ib.—Sentence of high treason pronounced against Cranmer, ib.—Proposals for Mary's marrying Philip, son to the emperor of Germany, 435—Dispute concerning the real presence, 436—Insurrections under sir T. Wiat, 437—Wiat surrendered and is shortly after beheaded, ib.—Attempt to draw Elizabeth into a snare, ib.—Lady Jane Grey and lord Guildford, executed, 438—The duke of Suffolk executed, ib.—Philip of Spain arrives in England, 439—Mary and Philip are married at Winchester, ib.—Philip protects Elizabeth from the malice of the queen, 440—Persecution against the protestants, ib.—John Rogers burnt in Smithfield, 441—Dr. John Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, burnt in his own diocese, ib.—Mr. Lawrence Saunders burnt at Coventry, ib.—Philpot, archdeacon of Winchester, burnt in Smithfield, ib.—Dr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, burnt at Carmarthen, ib.—Bishops Ridley and Latimer burnt at Oxford. ib.—Death of Stephen Gardiner, 443—Archbishop Cranmer degraded, 444—Cranmer burnt at Oxford, ib.—Affairs of the continent, 443—Attempt to entrap Elizabeth on the subject of the real presence, 447—Death of Mary, ib. Her character, ib.

Mortimer, queen Isabella's paramour, gets possession of the estates of many of the nobles, 192—Condemned as a traitor, and hanged, 193

Neville's Cross, battle of, 205

Ordeal, trial by, abolished in the reign of Henry III. 161

Otterbourne, battle of, 226

Pandolf, the pope's legate, requires king John to surrender the kingdom to the church, 134

Plantagenets, recapitulation of the history of, 318

Poictiers, battle of, 209

Provisions, prices of, 189

Reformation, history of, 406

Richard I. succeeds to the throne, 119—Engages in the crusade, 120—Carries on a successful war against the Infidels, 123—Detained by the Germans on his route to England, 125—Lands at Sandwich, ib.—Reconciled to his brother John, 126—His death and character, ib.

Richard II. ascends the throne, 219—Insurrection under Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, 220—Various insurrections, 221—Simon Sudbury murdered, ib.—Sir Robert Hales murdered, ib.—War with France, 220, 221, 222—Great devastations in England and Scotland, 222—Quarrel between the king and his nobles, 223—The duke of Lancaster returns to England, and effects a reconciliation between the king and the duke of Gloucester, 225—Battle of Otterbourne, 226—The king seizes the charter of London, which he soon after restores, ib.—Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, impeached by the commons, 227—The earl of Arundel beheaded, ib.—The duke of Gloucester died suddenly at Calais, ib.—The death of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, 228—Richard confiscates the duchy of Lancaster, ib.—Henry de Bolingbroke, the new duke of Lancaster, seeks the recovery of his dukedom, ib.—The duke of Lancaster becomes master of the kingdom, 229—Richard conducted to the Tower, ib.—The duke of Lancaster aspires to the crown, ib.—Articles of accusation against Richard, ib.—The duke claims the crown of England, 230—Death of Richard, 231—His character, ib.

Richard III. ascends the throne, 314—Sends to sir Robert Brackenbury to assassinate the two young princes, Edward V. and his brother Richard duke of York, 315—Battle of Bosworth, Richard is slain, 318—His character, ib.

Saxon reinforcements sent for by Hengist, 17—Drive the Britons into Wales, 21

Saxons invited to assist the Britons, 15—Remarks on the government, religion, and character of the Saxons, ib.

Stephen ascends the throne, 89—England involved in anarchy and confusion, 91—Matilda obtains the sovereignty of great part of the kingdom, 94—Stephen's death, 95—His character, ib.

Straw, Jack. See Wat Tyler.

Tyler, Wat, and Jack Straw, insurrection under, 220

Vortigern enamoured of Rowena, Hengist's daughter, 17—Cedes Kent to Hengist, ib.

William duke of Normandy lands in Sussex, 62—Battle of Hastings, 63—William I. gains possession of the throne, on the death of Harold, 66—Confiscates the estates of several English nobles, 67—Seizes the estates of the English, and confers them on his Norman mercenaries, 69—Suppresses an insurrection under Edwin and Morcar, 70—Punishes several with death or amputation of limbs for rebellion, 71—Dissensions in the king's family, 73—Commits great devastations in France, 74—Dies at St. Gervais near Rouen, ib.—His character, ib.

William II. ascends the throne, 75—Goes to war with his brother for the recovery of Normandy, 76—Narrowly escapes being put to death, ib.—Enters on a war with Scotland, ib.—Engaged in several petty wars with his relations and vassals, 77—Killed by accident in the New Forest, 80—His character, ib.

Wolsey, Cardinal, rise of, 351—appointed pope's legage, 357—disgraced, 372.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

Stratford, Printer,
Crown Court, Temple-Bar.

INDEX

TO THE SECOND VOLUME.

AGRICULTURE, 61
Aix la Chapelle, peace of, 358
Allen, William, murdered in St. George's Fields, 398
Alliance, Quadruple, 331
Amboyna, massacre of the English at, 52
America, disturbances in, occasioned by the Stamp Act, 394—and on account of some duties imposed on various commodities, 399—The English ministry resolve to persevere in levying the duty on tea exported to America, 401—Three ships laden with tea sent to Boston, and the Bostonians empty their cargoes into the sea, 405—Port of Boston blockaded, ib.—Commencement of the war with the Americans, ib.—See George III.—War with the United States of America, 632
Anne, Queen, ascends the throne, 298—The earl of Marlborough directs the queen in her resolutions, ib.—The allies of the English active on the continent, 299—Progress of the war, 300—Disgraceful conduct of the English captains under admiral Benbow, 301—The duke of Marlborough caressed on his return to England, on account of his successes, 304—Union of England and Scotland, 306—The duke of Marlborough prosecutes his successes, 307—Quarrel between the Whig and the Tory factions, 308—Dr. Henry Sacheverel inflames the parties by his harangues, ib.—Sacheverel brought to trial and prohibited from preaching for three years, 309—Successful prosecution of the war, ib.—The Russian ambassador maltreated, 311—Conferences for a peace, 313—The duke of Marlborough declines in his interest at court, ib.—Attempt on the life of Mr. Harley, 314—The war prosecuted with vigour and success, 316—The duke of Marlborough dismissed from his employments, ib.—Utrecht fixed upon as the place for treating of peace, 317—Violent party disputes, 318—Peace of Utrecht, ib.—Party quarrels still prosecuted in the cabinet, 319—Death of queen Anne, 320—Her character, ib.
Argyle, duke of, lands in Scotland, is overpowered, taken, and executed, 260
Aspern, battle of, 609
Atterbury, Dr. Bishop of Rochester, committed to the Tower, 334—Impeached, ib.—Banished, 335
Bedloe, William, concerned with Titus Oates and Dr. Tongue in a pretended popish plot, 245
Bellingham, John, executed for the assassination of the hon. Mr. Spencer Perceval, 632
Bernard, Mr. fined one thousand pounds for preaching against Pelagian errors and Romish superstition, 88
Birmingham, riots at, 443
Black Hole at Calcutta, Mr. Holwell and his associates confined in, 366
Bonaparte, Napoleon, born in Corsica after that island belonged to France, 398—Account of the family of, 462, n—(See George III.)—Dissolves the council of elders, and is appointed First Consul, 489 Made emperor of France, 568—Divorced from the empress Josephine, 610—Marries Maria Louisa, daughter of the emperor of Austria, 612—(See George III.)
Boscobel, a farm house on the borders of Staffordshire, Charles II. succoured by one Penderell at, 194
Boyne, battle of, 278
Brussels, king James's negociations treated with ridicule at, 40, n.
Buckingham, duke of, assassinated by Felton, 78
Buenos Ayres, expedition to, 580
Burdett, sir Francis, sent to the Tower, 611
Byng, admiral, his conduct at Minorca, 366—Shot, 369
Camelford, lord, killed in a duel with Mr. Best, 565
Cameron, Dr. Archibald, executed for treason, 362, n.
Capel, lord, executed, 187
Carisbrook Castle, Charles I. conducted to, 177
Ceylon, cruelties in, 562
Charles I. ascends the throne, 63—His spouse Henrietta, a daughter of France, arrives in England, ib.—Admiral Pennington refuses to fight against the Protestants at Rochelle, ib.—Complaints of the parliament against the screening of popish recusants, 64—The Puritans powerful in the house of commons, who embraced the side of freedom, 65—Prosecution of Montague, a court chaplain, for Arminianism, 66—The duke of Buckingham, the king's favourite, becomes very unpopular, 67—Articles of accusation found by the commons against Buckingham, ib.—Sir Dudley Digges and sir John Elliot, managers of the impeachment against Buckingham, thrown into prison, 68—These members released, ib.—Grants a commission to the archbishop of York to compound with the catholics, ib.—Takes arbitrary measures to raise money, 69—Several persons committed to prison in violation of the Great Charter, ib.—Sends a fleet to assist the Hugonots, under the duke of Buckingham, 71—The fleet returns without effecting any good, ib.—Charles acts in an arbitrary manner, 73—The commons pass a law which they call a Petition of Right, 76—Copy of the Petition of Right, ib. n.—House of commons censure the conduct of Buckingham, 77—The duke of Buckingham assassinated by Felton, 78—Felton condemned to death, 79—Dreadful state of the people of Rochelle, ib.—Disputes in parliament on the subject of religion, 80—Oliver Cromwell, a member of the house, speaks on the side of Puritanism, 81—Cruelties exercised in Ireland, 83, n.—Bishop Laud acts in an arbitrary manner, 84—Various tyrannical acts and unjust persecutions, ib.—Bishop Laud has great influence in ecclesiastical and civil matters, 85—Bishop Laud's consecration of the church of St. Katherine Cree, 86—Sherfield, recorder of Salisbury, prosecuted in the Star-chamber for having destroyed, by order of vestry, some panes of painted glass, ib.—Sherfield fined five hundred pounds, and removed from his office, 87—The rev. Mr. Bernard fined one thousand pounds, for preaching against Pelagian errors and Romish superstition, 88—Alexander Leighton, D. D. put in the pillory, and his ears cut off, for writing against prelacy, ib.—Monopolies revived, 89—Prynne, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, fined five thousand pounds, to lose his ears, and be imprisoned during life, for writing "Histrio Mastyx," ib.—Charles orders sports and recreations on Sunday, ib.—Laud made archbishop of Canterbury, ib.—Ship-money introduced, 90—Excessive fines imposed upon many noblemen and gentlemen, ib.—Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick most cruelly sentenced, and as cruelly treated, 91—Sir Arthur Hazelrig, John Hampden, and Oliver Cromwell, resolve to leave the country, but the ships in which they were to go were staid by an order of the council, 92—Williams, bishop of Lincoln, fined ten thousand pounds, and again eight thousand pounds, ib.—John Hampden brought to trial in the exchequer chamber for defending the liberties of the subject, 93—Charles attempts to impose the English liturgy, with a few alterations, on the Scotish nation, 95—The people begin to unite in opposition to religious innovations, ib.—The Scotch nobility, clergy, and gentry put forth the Covenant, 96—Charles orders a counter Covenant to be drawn up, ib.—Richelieu encourages the Scotish malcontents, 97—The covenanters in Scotland resolve to defend themselves by force of arms, ib.—The king sends an army towards the north, 98—Charles brought to terms with the covenanters, 99—Cardinal Richelieu concerts measures with the prince of Orange to attack the Spanish dominions, 100—The Spanish fleet destroyed by Van Tromp, the Dutch admiral, ib.—The parliament abridge the power of the crown with respect to the coin, 101—Discontents in Scotland become greater, 102—Charles discovers that the Scots are assisted by the cardinal Richelieu, ib.—D'Estrade, the French ambassador, haughtily treated by the queen Henrietta, 103—Colvil and the earl of Loudon sent to the Tower, ib.—The king orders William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, to execute Loudon, ib. n.—The king tears the warrant for Loudon's execution, ib. n.—The king's conduct towards Scotland debated in the English parliament, 104—The parliament being adverse to Charles's schemes, is dissolved, 106—Continual mutinies among the soldiers, 107—The Scots besiege and take Edinburgh castle, 108—The Scots take Newcastle, and the king's magazines of powder, ammunition, and provision, 109—The Scots petition for a redress of grievances, ib.—The English demand a redress of grievances, 110—The earl of Stafford, the king's general, attacked in the house of commons, 112—The earl of Strafford taken into custody, 113—Strafford impeached by the commons, ib.—Archbishop Laud accused of a design to subvert the laws and religion of the realm, 114—The citizens of London subscribe a petition against the hierarchy and government of the church of England, 115—Lord Wentworth taken from his tribunal in the court of King's Bench, and carried to prison, 116—The sentence against Prynne, Bastwick, and Burton reversed by the commons, 117—The impeachment of the earl of Strafford carried up to the house of lords, 119—The earl of Strafford found guilty of high treason, and beheaded, 126—The court of star-chamber set aside, and the marshal's court, which took cognizance of offensive words, abolished, 127—The king abridged of a considerable part of his authority, 128—The king goes to Scotland, to settle the differences, ib.—Plan to expel the English from Ireland, 130—One hundred and fifty-four thousand protestants slain in the province of Ulster, 131—The king charged with being concerned in the Irish rebellion, 135—The king demands five members of the house of commons, and lord Kimbolton, 138—Lord Kimbolton, Denzil Hollis, sir Arthur Hazelrig, Hampden, Pym, and Strode, accused of high treason in the house of peers in his majesty's name, ib.—The king, fearful of the people, retires to Hampton Court, 139—Petitions presented to the commons by many of the counties, promising to defend the privileges of parliament, 140—The breach between the king and parliament daily grows wider, 141—The king declares sir John Hotham, governor of Hull, a traitor, for refusing to admit him into the place, 142—The parliament justify sir John Hotham, ib.—The king prepares himself for defence against against the parliament, ib.—The king erects the royal standard at Nottingham, 143—The fleet declares for the parliament, ib.—The parliamentary forces compel the earl of Hertford with his army to fly before them, 144—Declaration of the king, 145—Battle of Keinton, or Edgehill, ib.—The earl of Essex, the parliamentary general, takes Reading, 146—Sir W. Waller, parliament general, takes Winchester, Chicester, Gloucester, Hereford, and Tewkesbury, 147—The royalists successful in the west, ib.—Hampden mortally wounded, 148—Bristol taken by the royalists, ib.—The king lays siege to Gloucester, 149—The parliament forces compel him to raise the siege, 150—The battle of Newberry, ib.—Sir Thomas Fairfax beats the royalists at Wakefield, ib.—Oliver Cromwell beats the royalists at Gainsborough, ib.—Lord Fairfax beaten at Atherton Moor, ib.—Royalists beaten at Horn-Castle, ib.—The Solemn League and Covenant framed at Edinburgh, 151—Affairs of Ireland, 152—Excise on beer, wine, &c. introduced, 153—The king makes some artful attempts to procure a peace, but is frustrated, ib.—Death of the famous Pym, 154—The royalists gain some successes, ib.—Sir Thomas Fairfax beats the royalists, ib.—The royalists beaten at Marston Moor, 155—The king's general, the marquis of Newcastle, leaves the kingdom, ib.—The king's forces discomfited at Newbury, 156—Cromwell and the Independents avow their republican principles, 157—The Self-denying Ordinance framed, 158—Cromwell invested with the direction of the parliamentary army, ib.—Archbishop Laud brought to the scaffold, 161—The battle of Naseby, in which the king's army was nearly destroyed, 166—Fairfax beats the king's forces at Lamport in Somersetshire, ib.—Fairfax takes Bridgewater, ib.—Fairfax takes Bristol and Prince Rupert's forces, ib.—Colonel Jones beats the king's forces at Chester, ib.—Various successes of the parliamentary forces, 166, 167—The king flies from Oxford, and arrives at the Scotish camp before Newark, 168—The Scotish generals and commissioners set a guard upon the king, ib.—The king strictly guarded, 169—The parliament and the Scots lay proposals before the king, which he refused to accept, ib.—The king delivered by the Scots to the English commissioners, and conducted to Holdenby in Northamptonshire, ib.—Death of the parliamentary general, Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, ib.—Disputes between the parliament and the soldiery, 171—Cornet Joyce seizes the king at Holdenby, 172—Cromwell, who had directed the seizure of the king, arrives in London, and puts an end to the deliberations of the parliament, ib.—The king's friends allowed by Cromwell to have access to him, he was allowed to correspond with the queen, and his children allowed to visit him, 173—The military gains the ascendant over the civil authority, 174—Charles entertains the idea of uniting the Scots and the cavaliers, 175—The king talks haughtily to the commissioners, ib.—The king escapes from the camp, and goes to the Isle of Wight, 176—Colonel Hammond acquaints the parliament of the king's being in his possession, 177—The king conducted to Carisbrook Castle, ib.—The army determined to bring the king to a trial, ib.—The king closely confined, and his attendants dismissed, 178 Westminster Hall fitted up for the trial of the king, 182—The king conducted to Westminster Hall, where the solicitor of the commons makes his charge against his majesty, ib.—The king objects to the competency of the court, 183—The king found guilty, and sentence of death pronounced against him, ib.—Copy of the warrant for the execution of the king, ib. n.—The king beheaded, 184—The real person who struck off the king's head pointed out, ib. n.—The character of Charles the First, 185—Duke Hamilton, lord Capel, and the earl of Holland, executed, 187

Charles II. proclaimed in Palace Yard, and at Temple Bar, 216—Charles disembarks at Dover, is met by general Monk, and proceeds to London, ib.—Monk created duke of Albemarle, ib.—The king passes an act of general indemnity, 217—Those who had an immediate hand in Charles's death excepted from the bill of indemnity, ib.—The regicides brought to trial, condemned, and executed, ib.—Death of the duke of Gloucester, the king's brother, ib.—Death of the princess of Orange, ib.—The duke of York marries Ann Hyde, daughter to Edward Hyde, now earl of Clarendon, 218—The bishops restored to their sees, the ejected clergy recovered their livings, and the liturgy was again admitted into the churches, ib.—Madness of the fifth-monarchy-men, who were, to the number of sixty, either killed, or executed, ib.—Charles attempts to establish the church of England in Scotland, ib.—The Covenant declared unlawful, ib—Conference at the Savoy between twelve bishops and twelve Presbyterians, ib.—The Act of Uniformity, 219—Catherine of Portugal, to whom the king was betrothed, landed at Portsmouth, ib.—The festivity of the king's marriage clouded by the execution of criminals, 220—Lambert and Vane brought to trial and found guilty, Lambert being reprieved at the bar, and Vane being executed, ib.—On St. Bartholomew's day two thousand ministers ejected from their livings, ib.—Dunkirk sold to the French, ib.—During his exile Charles had been reconciled to the church of Rome, 221—James duke of York a thorough catholic, ib.—The catholics allowed the free exercise of their religion, ib.—Preparations for a war with the Dutch, 222—Great naval action between the English and Dutch fleets, ib.—The plague breaks out in London, and destroys nearly ninety thousand inhabitants, 223—Dreadful actions between the English and Dutch fleets, which continued several days, 224—Fire of London, ib.—Negociations for peace with the Dutch, 225—The Dutch enter the Thames, ib.—The earl of Clarendon impeached by the commons, and banished, 226—Charles engages in the Triple Alliance, ib.—Affairs of the French and Spanish monarchies, ib.—Act passed against conventicles, 228—The king forms his ministry of Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, the initials of whose names formed the word CABAL, 229—Blood forms a design of carrying off the crown from the Tower, 230—Blood pardoned, and becomes a favourite of the king, ib. Popery becomes a ground of terror, 231—Preparations for war against Holland, ib.—Actions with the Dutch fleet, 231, 232—Affairs of Holland, 233—Cornelius de Wit torn in pieces, ib.—Dreadful action between the English and Dutch fleets, 235—Charles entertains the idea of marrying the prince of Orange to the lady Mary, heir apparent to the crown of England, (the duke of York having no issue,) 239—The prince of Orange arrives in England, ib.—Negociations for peace at Nimeguen, 240—Peace of Nimeguen, 241—Severe laws enacted against conventicles, and ruinous fines imposed on preachers and hearers, 242—The case of Mitchel, who was executed at Edinburgh, ib. n.—Dr. Tongue pretends to discover a plot to shoot the king, in which Titus Oates was the principal contriver, 243—William Bedloe, a wretch, if possible, more infamous than Oates, pretends to great discoveries of a plot, 245—Edward Coleman tried for being concerned in the pretended popish plot, found guilty, and executed, 246—Father Ireland, Grove, and Pickering, executed, on the evidence of Oates and Bedloe, ib.—Hill, Green, and Berry executed for the murder of sir Edmondsbury Godfrey, ib.—The duke of York requested to retire beyond sea, 247—Attempt to exclude the duke of York from the succession, 248—Impeachment of five popish lords and the earl of Danby, ib.—Five Jesuits executed for the pretended popish plot, 249—Archbishop Sharpe assassinated near St. Andrews in Scotland, 250—The duke of Monmouth sent against the covenanters in Scotland, whom he overthrows and treats with lenity, ib.—The meal-tub plot pretended to be discovered by one Dangerfield, 251—Viscount Stafford examined for the popish plot, 253—Dissensions between the king and the parliament, ib.—Fitz-harris executed for a libel, 255—Various executions on the evidence of false-witnesses, 255, 256, —The duke of York the principal instigator in some of the executions, 257—The duke of Monmouth engages in an insurrection, and aspires to the crown, 258—The Rye House Plot, ib.—Monmouth sent to the Tower, ib.—Several persons executed for being concerned in the duke of Monmouth's rebellion, ib.—Algernon Sidney executed, ib.—Several persons executed, for the same offence, ib.—Titus Oates fined one hundred thousand pounds, ib.—Death of Charles II, 259—His character, ib.

Church, affairs of, 320

Coin, the parliament abridge the power of the crown with respect to the, 101

Colonies belonging to England, 60

Commerce of England, 59

Conventicles, severe laws enacted against, and ruinous fines imposed on preachers and hearers, 242

Copenhagen, attack on, 496, 589

Covenant, the, put forth by the Scotish nobility, &c. 96

Cromwell, Oliver, hindered from leaving the kingdom by an order of Charles the First's council, 92—(see Charles I.)—Circumstances attending the formation of the republic, 187—Cromwell lays siege to Tredah, (Drogedah,) which he takes by assault, and puts the garrison to death, 189—He takes Wexford, and used similar severity, 190—Cromwell completely conquers Ireland, ib.—James Graham, duke of Montrose, hanged at Edinburgh, 192—Charles II. proclaimed in Scotland, where he lands in the Frith of Cromarty, ib.—Cromwell declared captain-general of all the forces in England, ib.—Cromwell marches to Scotland, ib.—Cromwell defeats the Scots near Dunbar, 193—Charles II. escapes from Argyle and flies to the Highlands, but is persuaded to return, ib.—Charles advanced with his army towards England, 194—Charles II. advances to Worcester, 194—Cromwell completely overthrows Charles II.'s army at Worcester, and the king with great difficulty escapes, ib.—Charles goes to Boscobel, a lone house on the borders of Staffordshire, inhabited by one Penderell, a farmer, ib.—Charles meets with great difficulty in concealing himself from the vigilance of the parliamentary forces, ib.—Charles leaves England, and arrives at Fescamp in Normandy, 195—Cromwell's credit greatly increased after the battles of Dunbar and Worcester, ib.—Blake, who had defended Lyme and Taunton against the king, made an admiral, ib.—Blake pursues prince Rupert to the Tagus, and takes twenty Portuguese ships richly laden, ib.—Ireland and Scotland reduced to submission, ib.—General Monk successful in Scotland, 196—Hostile measures taken against the Dutch, ib.—The English make prize of above eighty Dutch ships, ib.—An action between the English and Dutch fleets in the Dover roads, 197—Dreadful battle between De Ruyter and sir George Ayscue, ib.—Action between the English, under admirals Blake, Bourne, and Pen, with a Dutch a Dutch squadron under De Witte and De Ruiter, ib.—A furious battle between the Dutch and English fleets, in which the English were beaten, ib.—Another fierce battle between the English and Dutch fleets, under the same commanders, Van Tromp and Blake, lasted three days, ib.—Cromwell dissolves the Long Parliament, 198—Oliver Cromwell chosen Protector, 199—Makes peace with the United States, 200—Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portuguese ambassador, murders a person on the exchange, ib.—Don Pantaleon Sa executed on Tower Hill, 201—The leaders of a conspiracy to bring in the king, taken, and capitally punished, 202—Affairs of Germany, and treaty of Westphalia, ib.—Affairs of Sweden, ib.—Affairs of France, ib.—The English resent the measures of the court of France, 203—The court of Spain courts the alliance of the Protector, ib.—Cromwell strikes terror into the different states of Europe by his naval preparations, 204—Cromwell makes war upon the Spaniards, and has various success, ib.—Cromwell urged to massacre the royalists, but always rejected such sanguinary counsels, 205—Cromwell friendly to the Independents, Presbyterians, &c. but kept the church of England in constraint, ib.—The Protector extremely vigilant in procuring intelligence, ib.—Cromwell's general behaviour and deportment such as might befit the greatest monarch, 206—Motion for investing the Protector with the dignity of king, ib.—Cromwell rejects the offer, 207—Cromwell allowed to appoint his successor, ib.—Richard, Cromwell's eldest son, introduced at court, and regarded as his successor, 208—Discovery of a plot of the royalists, ib.—The death of his daughter, Mrs. Claypole, greatly affected Cromwell, 209—Cromwell's death, ib.—Character of Cromwell, 210—Genealogical account of Oliver Cromwell and his family, ib. n.—Oliver Cromwell's funeral, 211, n.

Cromwell, Richard, Protector, 211—Henry Cromwell, Richard's brother, assured him of the obedience of Ireland, and Monk proclaimed the new protector in Scotland, ib.—Cabals entered into against Richard Cromwell, 212—Richard signs his demission in form, ib.—Henry Cromwell, deputy of Ireland, resigns his command, and retires to England, ib.—Monk resolves to restore the royal family, 215

Dardanelles, expedition to, 587

Despard, colonel Edward Marcus, executed for high treason, 502

Dogger Bank, naval action off the, 417

Duelling introduced in James I.'s reign, 21

Dunbar, Cromwell defeats the Scots at, 193

Edge-hill, or Keinton, battle of, 145

Excise on beer, wine, &c. introduced, 153

Eylau, battle of, 582

Falkland Islands, dispute with Spain concerning, 401

Farmer, capt. blown up in the Quebec, 412

Felton stabs the duke of Buckingham, 78—Executed, 79

Fenwick, case of sir John, 292—Beheaded, 293

Finances of England, observations on, 57

Fitz-harris executed for a libel, 255

Fox, death of the hon. C. J. 580

France, revolution in, 444—Louis XVI. king of, beheaded, 445—Marie Antoinette, queen of, beheaded, 447

George I. ascends the throne, 322—Lands at Greenwich, ib.—Party disputes between the Whigs and Tories, 324—The earl of Strafford impeached, 325—A reward offerred for seizing the Pretender dead or alive, 326—Insurrection in favour of the Pretender, 327—The earls of Derwentwater, Nithisdale, Carnwarth, and Wintown, the lords Widrington, Kenmuir, and Nairne, impeached, and pleading guilty, all except lord Wintown, receive sentence of death, 329—Vast numbers executed on account of the rebellion, 330—The king resolves to visit his Hanoverian dominions, ib.—Rupture with Spain, ib.—Quadruple alliance, 331 South Sea Company, ib.—Failure of the South Sea Company, 333—Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, committed to the Tower, 334—Bishop Atterbury impeached, ib.—Bishop Atterbury banished, 335—Death of George I. 326—His character, ib.

George II. ascends the throne, 337—Causes of dissension in the house of commons, ib.—England greatly infested with robbers, assassins, and incendiaries, 340—George Robinson, Esq. cashier, and John Thompson, warehouse-keeper to the Charitable Corporation, disappear in one day, and the affairs of the company investigated by parliament, 341—Several members expelled the house of commons for fraudulent actions, 342—Pragmatic Sanction confirmed by the diet of the empire, ib.—Remarkable instance of suicide, ib.—Georgia in America colonized, ib.—Debates in parliament, 343—The famous Gin Act passed, 345—Murder of captain Porteus, 346—Bill for punishing the magistrates and city of Edinburgh on account of the murder of captain Porteus, ib.—Death of the queen, 347—Admiral Vernon takes Porto Bello, with six ships only, ib.—Hard frost, 348—Expedition to the South Sea, ib.—Battle of Dettingen, 350—Misunderstanding between admirals Matthews and Lestock, 351—The chevalier Charles lands in Scotland, ib.—Progress of the Pretender, 352—Battle of Preston-pans, 353—Lords Kilmarnock, Balmerino, Cromartie, and others taken, 356—Cruelties exercised in the north, ib.—Execution of Mr. Radcliffe, titular earl of Derwentwater and others, for high treason in favouring the Pretender, 357—Peace of Aix la Chapelle, 358—Discontents of Frederic prince of Wales, 359—Contested election for Westminster between lord Trentham and sir George Vandeput, 360—Reformation of the calendar, and the New Stile introduced, 361—The king makes a voyage to the continent, ib.—War in the East Indies between the rival companies of France and England, 362—Dr. Archibald Cameron executed for treason, ib. n.—Establishment of the British Museum, ib.—Affair of Elizabeth Canning, ib.—Peace in India, 363—Preparations for war with France, 364—Progress of the war with the French in America, 365—Conduct of admiral Byng at Minorca, 366—Minorca taken by the French, 367—Fort Geriah, Angria's capital taken by the English, ib. Mr. Holwell and his associates confined in the Black Hole at Calcutta, ib.—Admiral Byng brought to trial, 368—Admiral Byng sentenced to death, and shot, 369—Gallant action of captain Forrest, 370—Various naval successes, ib.—The English successful in Africa, 373—Affairs of the East Indies, 374—General James Wolfe killed at the conquest of Quebec, 375—Naval successes of the English in the Mediterranean, 376—Gallant action of sir Edward Hawke off Belleisle, ib.—The war in Germany carried on with various success, but in which Frederic king of Prussia was mostly successful, 377—Petition for removing the magazine from the neighbourhood of East Greenwich, 278—The city of London ordered to be widened in the streets and paved, 379—M. Thurot makes a descent in Ireland, but is discomfited, ib.—General Amherst takes Montreal, ib.—Death of George II. 380—His character, ib.

George III. grandson of George II. ascends the throne, 381—Extract from the king's speech on the assembling of parliament, ib.—Advances the salaries of the judges, 382—Marries Charlotte Sophia, princess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, 383—Proposals for a peace, ib.—The allies successful by land, and the English by sea, 384, 385—War declared against Spain, 385—Successful attack on the Moro Castle, 386—The English make a descent on the island of Manilla, 387—Progress of the war, 388—Birth of the prince of Wales, 389—Peace restored, 390—Prosecution against Mr. Wilkes and others on account of the 45th number of the North Briton, ib.—Affairs of the East Indies, 391—The Delaware and Shawanese Indians renew the war, 392—Lord Byron tried for murder, and found guilty of manslaughter, 393—The silk weavers complain of the encouragement given to French silks, and commit outrages, ib.—The Isle of Man annexed to England, ib.—Disturbances arise in America, on account of the Stamp Act, 394—The Americans refuse to buy or sell English manufactures, 395—Death of his royal highness William duke of Cumberland, ib.—Contests in England on account of the Stamp Act as applicable to America, ib.—Commotions in consequence of the high price of provisions, 396—Carolina Matilda, his majesty's youngest sister, married to the king of Denmark, 397—Edward duke of York, his majesty's brother, dies at Monaco in Italy, ib.—Affairs of Corsica, ib.—The Corsicans assisted by the English, ib.—Corsica reduced under the French monarchy, 398—Napoleon Bonaparte, emperor of the French, born in Corsica after that island belonged to France, ib. n.—William Allen, murdered in St. George's Fields, ib. n.—The king of Denmark arrives in England on a visit to his majesty, ib.—Disturbances in America on account of some duties imposed on various commodities, 399—Mr. Wilkes expelled the house of commons, 400—The ministers resolve to persevere in levying the duty on tea exported to America, 401—Disputes on account of the Middlesex election, ib.—Dispute with Spain concerning the Falkland islands, ib.—Corruptions in the election of members to parliament discovered, 402—Mr. Wheble and Mr. Miller, printers of Newspapers, taken into custody for publishing the debates of the house of commons, and liberated, by the lord mayor and aldermen Wilkes and Oliver, 402—The lord mayor and Mr. Oliver committed to the Tower, ib.—Dispute concerning the subscription to the thirty-nine articles, 403—Death of the princess dowager of Wales, the king's mother, ib.—His majesty's sister, the queen of Denmark, charged with carrying on a criminal correspondence with the count Struensee, ib.—Counts Struensee and Brandt executed, 404—The queen of Denmark permitted to reside at Zell, where she died with grief, ib.—Three ships laden with tea sent to Boston, and the Bostonians empty their cargoes into the sea, 405—The port of Boston blockaded, ib.—Henry Sampson Woodfall, printer, and the rev. John Horne, cited before the house of commons for a libel, but at length discharged, ib.—Commencement of the war with America, ib.—Various measures adopted by the friends to peace to avert the impending storm, 406—The ministers determine to subdue the colonies, ib.—General Gage attacks the provincials at Lexington and Concord, and loses three times as many as the Americans, 407—Battle of Bunker's Hill, in which the king's troops are victorious, ib.—The congress declares the colonies independent, 408—The provincials defeated at the battle of the White Plains, ib.—Fire in the dock-yard at Portsmouth, for which James Aitken, otherwise John the Painter, was executed, 409—Progress of the war, ib.—General Gates captures general Burgoyne and his army at Saratoga, 410—Hostilities commenced between France and England, ib.—Engagement between the fleets of France and England off Ushant, 411—Admiral Keppel tried for misconduct and acquitted, ib.—General Clinton evacuates Philadelphia, ib.—Georgia

Georgia surrenders to the British troops, ib.—The Americans take the strong post of Stoney Point, with the garrison, stores, and ammunition, 412—Captain Farmer blown up in the Quebec, ib.—Capture of Fort Omoa on the Bay of Honduras, 413—Success of admiral Rodney against the Spanish fleet under Don Langara, ib.—Major André taken, and executed as a spy, 414—Riots in London, ib.—Lord George Gordon tried for high treason, and acquitted, ib.—Hostilities declared against Holland, ib.—St. Eustatius taken by admiral Rodney and general Vaughan, 415—Complaints against the conduct of Vaughan and Rodney at St. Eustatius, 416—Actions between M. de Grasse and sir Samuel Hood, ib.—Naval action off the Dogger Bank, 417—West Florida taken by the Spaniards, ib.—The Americans defeat colonel Tarleton at the Cowpens, ib.—Disgraceful action of a British officer at Fort Trumbull, ib.—Colonel Isaac Hayne executed by order of lord Rawdon and colonel Balfour, 418—Lord Cornwallis and his army surrendered to general Washington, ib.—The French and Spaniards attack Gibraltar, but fail in their enterprize, 419—St. Eustatius and St. Martin captured by the marquis de Bouille, ib.—Minorca taken by the Spaniards, 420—St. Christopher and Nevis captured by the French, ib.—Naval action between the English under admiral Rodney and the French under the count de Grasse, in which the former were successful, 421—The Royal George of one hundred guns lost at Spithead, 422—Paul Jones commits great depredations, 423—Preliminaries of peace signed between England and France, and England and Spain, 424—The definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and France, Spain, and America, signed, 425—The coalesced ministers lord North and Mr. Fox dismissed by his majesty from their office, 426—Disputes in parliament, ib.—Distracted state of the British councils, 427—The great seal of England stolen from the lord chancellor's house, 428, n.—Scrutiny on account of the Westminster election, 429—Proceedings in parliament, 430—Death of Charles Edward Louis Casimir Stuart at Rome, known by the appellation of the Young Pretender, 434—The king afflicted with a dreadful malady, ib.—Proposal to make the prince of Wales regent during the indisposition of the king, 435—Debates on the subject, 435, 436—His majesty declared free from complaint, goes in procession to St. Paul's cathedral, 437—The subject of the slave trade debated, ib.—Proceedings in parliament, ib.—Dispute with the Spaniards concerning Nootka Sound, 439—Mutiny on board the Bounty, 440—Discussion on the war with Tippoo Sultan, 441—Riots at Birmingham, 443—Peace between Russia and the Porte through the mediation of Great Britain, ib.—Riotous assembly at Coventry on account of the high price of provisions, 444—Gustavus III. king of Sweden, assassinated by Ankerstrom, ib. n.—Revolution in France, ib.—The French king escapes from the Thuilleries, but is retaken, ib.—LouisXVI. condemned and executed, 445—The British ministry alarmed at the growth of republicanism, ib.—Hostilities against republican France, ib.—His majesty subsidizes the king of Sardinia, ib.—War decreed against Great Britain and Holland by the French national convention, ib.—Progress of the war, 446—The French become masters of Savoy, ib.—The Austrian Netherlands subjugated by France, ib.—Dumourier deserts the French service, ib.—Dumourier becomes a fugitive and a vagabond, 447—The queen of France beheaded, ib. n.—The duke of York's forces discomfited before Dunkirk, and himself escapes with difficulty, ib.—The English take possession of Toulon, but are speedily obliged to evacuate it, ib.—The English successful in the West Indies, 448—The English gain a decisive victory over the French fleet west off Ushant, ib.—The English take the island of Corsica, ib.—Trials of Thomas Hardy, John Horne Tooke, and others, who were all acquitted, 449—Holland subjugated by France, and the stadtholder obliged to leave it, 450—The prince of Wales marries the princess Caroline of Brunswick, ib.—Debates in parliament, ib.—The stadtholder and his family arrive in England, 453—The French remarkably successful, ib.—The French crush the revolt in La Vendée, ib.—Insurrection at Paris, 454—The allies severally make peace with France, 456—The fatal expedition to Quiberon, ib.—Cape of Good Hope taken by the English, 457—The king assaulted in his passage to the house of peers, ib.—Kidd Wake, a journeyman printer, imprisoned several years, ib.—Debates in parliament, 458—The princess Charlotte of Wales born, 460—Account of the family of Napoleon Bonaparte, 462, n.—Bonaparte amazingly successful in Italy, 463—Progress of the war, 464—Parliamentary intelligence, 467—The battles of St. Michael, Corono, Anguira, Rivoli, and La Favorite, in all which Bonaparte beat the Austrians, 470—Italy, the popedom of the other provinces subjugated by France, ib.—The British arms successful in the West Indies, ib.—The English obtain a signal victory over the Spanish fleet off Cape St. Vincent, 471—Admiral Duncan obtains a victory over the Dutch fleet near the Texel, ib.—Alarming mutiny in the English fleet, 472—Richard Parker, considered the ring-leader of the mutineers, executed on board the Sandwich at the Nore, 474 The king refuses to accept a petition from the city of London on the throne, which occasions a ferment in the city, ib.—Meeting called by the corresponding society assembled in the parish of St. Pancras, 475—Proceedings thereon, ib.—Disturbances in different parts of Scotland, ib.—Insurrections in Ireland, ib.—Parliamentary affairs, 476—Tax on Income, 477—Irish rebellion, 478—Switzerland subjugated by France, 480—Bonaparte sails for Egypt with a large armament, 481—Bonaparte takes the island of Malta, and afterwards lands at Alexandria, ib.—Disastrous expedition to Ostend, ib.—Admiral Nelson destroys the French fleet at Aboukir. 482—Minorca retaken by the English, ib.—Tippoo Saib slain in the assault at Seringapatam, 483—Expedition to North Holland, which was attended with some success, 484—A shot fired at the king, in the theatre, by James Hadfield, an insane person, 485—Affairs of parliament relative to the Union of Ireland, ib.—The nation now designated The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, ib.—Bonaparte successful in Egypt, 486—Bonaparte takes Jaffa, and, as the Turks gave no quarter, he orders every tenth man to be selected and shot, 487—Bonaparte repulsed at St. John d'Acre, 488—Bonaparte successful in Egypt, 489—Bonaparte returns to France, ib.—Bonaparte dissolves the council of elders, and is appointed the first consul, ib.—Dreadful state of Genoa through the want of provisions, 490—The French successful in Germany, ib.—Bonaparte crosses the Alps, 491—and is signally successful in Italy, 492—Disturbances in England on account of the high price of corn, 493—Treaty of Luneville, by which the French acquired great accession of territory, 494—Mr. Pitt resigns the office of premier, 495—Observations on Mr. Pitt's administration, ib.—John Horne Tooke excluded from the house of commons, 496—Attack on Copenhagen, ib.—Death of Paul emperor of Russia, 497—The French forces evacuate Egypt, 498—Treaty of Amiens signed, 499—Loss of the Margate hoy, ib.—Affairs of parliament, 500—Apprehension of colonel Despard and others, 501—Colonel Edward Marcus Despard tried for high treason, found guilty, and executed, 502—Many of his associates executed, ib.—The French demand, according to the treaty of Amiens, possession of Malta, which the governor refuses, ib.—Sir J. Saumarez rewarded by his majesty for his services, ib.—An extraordinary forgery took place in London, 503—Correspondence concerning the treaty of Amiens, 504—Debates in parliament relative to Malta, 506—French declaration of war on account of the island of Malta, 512—Abstract of the English declaration of war, ib. n.—Debates in parliament, 513—Meeting of the city of London concerning the Income Tax, 529—Hanover taken possession of by the French, 531—The French successful by land, the English by sea, 533—St. Lucie taken by the English, 534—Plan for sea fencibles, 535—Debates in parliament, 536—Affairs of Ireland, 542—Lord Kilwarden murdered at Dublin, ib.—Loss of the Lady Hobart packet, 544—Fire at Westminster Abbey, 547—Debates in parliament, ib.—Trials of the insurgents in Ireland, 553—Parliamentary affairs, 554—Policy of Bonaparte, 555—Fate of Switzerland, 557—Mohammed Elfi Bey arrives in England, 558—Review of the volunteers, 559—Execution of Emmet and Russel in Ireland, 556—Demerara and Essequibo taken by the English, ib.—Correspondence between the king and the prince of Wales, 560—Affairs of parliament, 561—Cruelties in Ceylon, 562—The king's bounty to the cardinal of York, 563—Apprehension of general Pichegru, 565, n.—Duel between lord Camelford and Mr. Best, in which the former was killed, ib.—Affairs of parliament, 567—Napoleon Bonaparte made emperor of France, 568—Discomfiture of admiral Linois by the British China fleet, 569—Hurricane in the West Indies, 570—Loss of the Doris frigate, 571—Abuses in the navy department, ib.—Establishment of an Oriental college at Hertford, 572—Victory over the French and Spanish combined fleets off Cape Trafalgar, when admiral lord Nelson was killed, 574—Death of Mr. Pitt, 576—Trial of lord viscount Melville, who is acquitted, 577—Battle of Jena, 578—Naval actions, 579—The Cape of Good Hope taken by the English, ib.—Expedition to Buenos Ayres, 580—Death of the hon. C. J. Fox, ib.—Battle of Eylau, 582—Affairs of parliament, 583—Peace of Tilsit, 585—Expedition to the Dardanelles, 587—Disastrous expedition to the Rio de la Plata, 588—Expedition to Copenhagen, 589—Affairs of Spain, 590—The royal family of Portugal retire to the Brazils, 591—Death of the cardinal York, the last of the Stuart family, ib.—Convention of Cintra, 599—The duke of York accused of disposing of military promotions for money, 601—The duke of York resigns his office of commander in chief of the forces, 603—Disastrous expedition to Walcheren, 605—Death of sir John Moore, 607 Bonaparte takes Vienna, 609—Battle of Aspern, ib.—Bonaparte divorced from the empress Josephine, 610—Sir Francis Burdett committed to the Tower, 611—The duke of Brunswick driven from his dominions, takes shelter in England, 612—Bonaparte marries Maria Louisa, daughter of the emperor of Austria, ib. Hanover annexed to the kingdom of Westphalia, 613—Death of the princess Amelia, 615—His majesty afflicted with a dreadful malady, ib.—Debates on the regency, 616—His royal highness the prince of Wales appointed regent during his majesty's indisposition, 618—Lord Wellington successful in Spain, 619—War between France and Russia, 622—Progress of the war with Russia, ib.—

The

The Russians destroy Moscow, which is entered by the French while on fire, 627—The French army destroyed by the frost, 629—The French advance against the Russians, and after several actions, in which the French are successful, an armistice is agreed upon, 631—The hon. Spencer Perceval shot in the lobby of the house of commons, ib.—John Bellingham, the assassin of Mr. Perceval executed, 632—Debates on the treaty between Great Britain and Sweden, ib.—War with America, ib.—Progress of the war, 633—Unhappy difference between the prince regent and his royal consort, 634,—which terminates greatly to the princess's honour, 636—Lord Wellington gains a compleat victory over the French under king Joseph, ib.

Gibraltar attacked by the French and Spaniards, 419

Glencoe, massacre of, 283

Good Hope, Cape of, taken by the English, 457

Government of England, observations on the civil, 54

———, ecclesiastical, 56

Gunpowder treason plot discovered, 9

Hadfield, James, an insane person, fires a pistol at the king, in the theatre, 485

Hamilton, the duke of, executed, 187

Hanover annexed to the kingdom of Westphalia, 613

Hardy, Thomas, trial of for high treason, acquitted, 449

Harley, attempt on the life of Mr. 314

Hertford, Oriental college established at, 572

Hogue, the French fleet defeated near Cape la, 284

Holland, the earl of, executed, 187

James I. ascends the throne of England, 3—Hangs a thief at Newark without form or trial, ib.—Extremely lavish in bestowing titles, 4—Agrees to support the States-General in conjunction with the king of France, ib.—Discovery of a plot to place Arabella Stuart on the throne, and some persons were executed, 4, 5—Sir Walter Raleigh found guilty, upon very suspicious evidence of being concerned in this plot, but reprieved, and kept in confinement, 5—Resolves to hinder the growth of Puritanism in England, ib.—Some alterations in the liturgy agreed to, ib.—Proclamations issued ordering jesuits and popish priests of a particular description to leave the kingdom, and Puritans to conform to the established church, 6—Addresses the parliament in a copious harangue, ib.—Contests in the house of commons, 7—A spirit of liberty manifested in the house of commons, 8—The union of England and Scotland canvassed in parliament, 9—Peace with Spain concluded, 10—Gunpowder treason plot, ib.—Laws against popish recusants, 14, 15—The French king murdered by Ravaillac, 18—King James recommends the burning of Conradus Vorstius, an Arminian professor at Leyden, ib.—Edward Wightman and Bartholomew Legate burnt in England by king James's warrant, ib. n.—Attempts to civilize the Irish, ib.—Sudden death of Henry, prince of Wales, 19—Seizure and death of Arabella Stuart, 19—Robert Carr, becomes a favourite of the king, 20—Creates Robert Carr viscount Rochester, 20—Restores some families whom Elizabeth had degraded to their blood and dignities, ib.—Viscount Rochester wishes to espouse the countess of Essex, ib.—He reveals the matter to sir Thomas Overbury, who advises him to the contrary; he swears vengeance against Overbury, and procures his commitment to the Tower, 21—The countess of Essex divorced from her husband and married to Rochester, who is created earl of Somerset, ib.—Sir Thomas Overbury poisoned, ib.—Duelling introduced in James's reign, ib.—Public lottery (the first in England) to raise money, 22—Debate concerning impositions, ib.—James begins to estrange himself from Somerset, 23—Somerset arrested in the king's presence, 24—Several persons concerned in the murder of sir Thomas Overbury tried and executed, ib.—The king interferes in ecclesiastical matters, 26—Attempts to impose innovations on the clergy, 28 James sends Raleigh on an expedition to South America, 29—Sir Walter Raleigh beheaded, 31—Disputes between the king and the parliament, 37—Several members of parliament, who had spoken in defence of their religion and liberty, committed to prison, 39—Lord Digby sent to Spain to conclude a treaty of marriage between the infanta and the prince of Wales, ib.—James, a Calvinist, allows four thousand men to be raised in England to act against the Protestants, 40—James's negociations treated with ridicule at Brussels, ib. n.—James still prosecutes his views of marrying the prince of Wales to the infanta of Spain, 41—Baby Charles (the prince of Wales) and Stennie (the duke of Buckingham) set out for Spain, 42—Charles in his journey has a prepossession in favour of Henrietta a princess of France, 43—Letter from the prince of Wales to the pope, ib.—Charles and Buckingham return to England, 46—The match with the infanta broke off, 47—Henry Rich, earl of Holland, sent to France with proposals of marriage between the prince of Wales and Henrietta third daughter to Henry IV. 48—The proposal favourably received in France, 51—Massacre of the English at Amboyna, 52—Death of James, 53—His character, ib.

James II. a bigotted papist, ascends the throne, 259—Sends one Caryl to Rome to pave the way for the re-admission of England into the bosom of the church, 260—The pope advises him not to attempt what experience might convince him was impracticable, ib.—Titus Oates brought to trial and severely punished, ib.—The duke of Argyle lands in Scotland, but is overpowered, taken prisoner, and executed, ib.—The duke of Monmouth lands in the west, ib.—The duke of Monmouth taken, and beheaded, 261 Dreadful cruelties committed in the west by judge Jefferies, colonel Kirke, and others, ib.—The king endeavours to secure a catholic interest in the privy council, 262—James sends an embassy to Rome, and attempts to establish the catholic religion, 263—Exasperates the protestants by his arbitrary proceedings in favour of the catholics, 264—Commits the archbishop and six bishops to the Tower, ib.—The bishops brought to trial and acquitted, 265—The people determined to drive James from the throne, and invite the prince of Orange to fill it, ib.—William prince of Orange lands at Torbay with fourteen thousand men, 266—James despised and treated with contempt by those to whom he applied, 266, 267—James II. leaves the kingdom, ib.

Jefferies, Judge, commits dreadful cruelties in the west, 261

Income, tax on, 477

Joyce, Cornet, seizes Charles I. at Holdenby, 172

Ireland, cruelties exercised in, 83, n.

Ireland, plan to expel the English from, 130—One hundred and fifty-four thousand protestants slain in the province of Ulster, 131

Kilwarden, lord, murdered at Dublin, 542

Kirke, colonel, commits dreadful cruelties in the west, 261

Lamport, battle of, 166

Laud, archbishop, brought to the scaffold, 161

Learning and Arts, 61

Legate, Bartholomew, burnt in England, 18, n.

Lowdon, the earl of, sent to the Tower, 103—Charles I. orders William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, to execute Lowdon, ib. n.—The king tears the warrant for Lowdon's execution, ib. n.

Man, Isle of, annexed to England, 393

Manners, &c. of England, observations on, 269

Manufactures of England, 59

Marston Moor, battle of, 155

Meal-tub plot, pretended to be discovered by one Dangerfield, 251

Military and Naval history, 58

Monmouth, the duke of, engages in an insurrection, and aspires to the crown, 258—Sent to the Tower, but afterwards liberated, ib.—Lands in the west, 260—Taken, and beheaded, 261

Montrose, duke of, hanged at Edinburgh, 192

Moore, death of sir John, 607

Moro Castle taken by the English, 386

Moscow destroyed by the Russians, 627

Museum, establishment of the British, 362

Mutiny on board the English fleet, 472

Naseby, battle of, 166

Nelson, lord, killed in an engagement with the French and Spanish combined fleets off Cape Trafalgar, 574

Newbury, battle of, 156

Newcastle, and king Charles I.'s magazines of powder, ammunition, and provisions, taken at, by the Scots, 109

Nimeguen, peace of, 241

Nootka Sound, dispute with the Spaniards concerning, 439

Nottingham, Charles I. erects the royal standard at, 143

Oates, Titus, the principal contriver of a sham plot, through which he swore falsely against many, who were executed, 243—Fined one hundred thousand pounds, 258

Orange, the prince of, invited to fill the throne of England, 265—William prince of Orange lands at Torbay, 266

Overbury, sir Thomas, poisoned, 21

Perceval, Spencer, shot in the lobby of the house of commons, 631

Pitt, Mr. resigns the office of premier, 495—Observations on Mr. Pitt's administration, ib.—Death of, 576

Portsmouth, fire at the dock yard of, 409

Portugal, royal family of, retire to the Brazils, 591

Prynne, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, fined five thousand pounds, to lose his ears, and be imprisoned during life, for writing "Histrio Mastyx," 89

Puritanism, James I. resolves to hinder the growth of, 5

Quiberon, fatal expedition to, 456

Radcliffe, Mr. titular earl of Derwentwater, executed for high treason, 357

Raleigh, sir Walter, beheaded, 31

Ravaillac murders the French king, 18

Republic, (The)—See Oliver Cromwell.

Right, copy of the petition of, 76, n.

Rio de la Plata, disastrous expedition to, 588

Royal George of one hundred guns lost at Spithead, 422

Rye House plot, 258

Ryswick, peace of, 293

Sacheverel, Dr. Henry, inflames the parties by his harangues, 308—Prohibited from preaching for three years, 309

Sharpe, archbishop, assassinated, 250

Sherfield, recorder of Salisbury, fined five hundred pounds for breaking a few panes of glass, 87

Sidney, Algernon, executed, 258

South Sea Company, 331—Failure of, 333

Stafford, viscount, executed for the popish plot, 253

Stamp Act occasions disturbances in America, 394

Star-chamber, the court of, set aside, 127

Stile, New, introduced in England, 361

Strafford, the earl of, taken into custody, and impeached by the commons, 113—The impeachment carried up to the house of lords, 119—The earl of Strafford beheaded, 126

Stuart, Charles Edward Louis Casimir, death of, 434

Sunday sports and recreations ordered by Charles I. 89

Tillotson, Dr. John, archbishop of Canterbury, death of, 289

Tilsit, peace of, 585

Tongue, Dr. pretends to discover a plot to shoot the king, (Charles II.) 243

Tooke, John Horne, tried for high treason, acquitted, 449

Toulon, the English take possession of, but speedily evacuate it, 447
Tredah (Drogheda) siege of, 189—Taken by assault, and the garrison put to the sword, ib.
Vienna, taken by Bonaparte, 609
Union of England and Scotland, 306—Union of Ireland, 485
Union of England and Scotland canvassed in parliament, 9
Utrecht, peace of, 318
Wake, Kidd, a journeyman printer, imprisoned several years, for an assault on the king, 457
Walcheren, disastrous expedition to, 605
Wales, his royal highness the prince of, appointed regent during the indisposition of his majesty, 618
Wellington, lord, remarkably successful in Spain, 619—et aliis locis.
Westminster Abbey, fire at, 547
Wightman, Edward, burnt in England, 18, n.
William III. and Mary II. accede to the throne, 275—James lands in Ireland, raises an army, and cruelly treats the protestants, 276—James lays siege to Londonderry, which he abandoned soon after that town received reinforcements, ib.—The Inniskilliners plundered and cruelly treated by James and general Sarsfield, 277—William lands in Ireland, ib.—James advantageously posted on the banks of the Boyne, where William determined to give him battle, ib.—The battle of the Boyne, in which William was successful, and James retreated with precipitation, 278—After the battle of the Boyne James retired to France, ib.—Action between the French and English fleets, in which the former were successful, 279—The earl of Torrington, who commanded the English fleet, sent to the Tower, and being brought to trial was acquitted, but the king dismissed him from the service, ib.—William returns to England, ib.—William's forces successful in Ireland, 280—James's army embarks for France, and Ireland is entirely subjugated by William's forces, 281—The massacre at Glencoe, 283—The French fleet defeated near Cape La Hogue, 284—Retirement and death of James II. 285—Death of Dr. John Tillotson, archbishop of Canterbury, 289—Death of queen Mary II. ib.—Her character, ib.—The war against France carried on with success, 292—Case of sir John Fenwick, ib.—Sir John Fenwick beheaded, 293—Peace of Ryswick, ib.—Death of the duke of Gloucester, 295—New settlement of the succession, ib.—The earl of Oxford and lord Somers impeached, 296—Death of William III. 297—His character, ib.
Wolfe, general, killed at Quebec, 375
York, archbishop of, commissioned to compound with the catholics, 68—Duke of, (See George III.)

END OF THE SECOND VOLUME.

DIRECTIONS for placing the ENGRAVINGS.

No.	SUBJECT.	Vol. I.	Vol. II.
1	FRONTISPIECE, to face the Title of Vol. I.
2	Death of Charles I.		184
4	Death of Sir John Moore, at Corunna		607
6	Landing of Julius Cæsar	7
8	Death of the Earl of Sandwich		232
10	Mary Queen of Scots landing in England	474
12	Canute reproving his Courtiers	54
14	Elizabeth Barton practising her Impositions	380
16	Death of William II.	80
18	Boadicea haranguing her Troops	10
20	Death of Lord Darnley	470
22	Matilda's Escape from Oxford Castle	94
24	Massacre of the Druids	12
26	The Heroism of Captain Farmer		412
28	The Shipwreck of Prince William		88
30	Queen Margaret protected by a Robber	299
32	Charles I. parting with his Children		183
34	The Exposing of Prince Edwin	58
36	Treachery of Elfrida	49
38	Siege of Gibraltar		419
40	The Archduke Charles rallying his troops at the Battle of Asperne		609
42	Edward and the Duke of York smothered in the Tower	315
44	Charles II. disguised as a Woodman		194
46	Seizure of Guy Fawkes		12
48	Death of General Wolfe		375
50	Fatal Effect of the Plague in 1665		225
52	Abdication of James II.		267
54	The young Earl of Richmond before Henry VI.	290
56	William I. wounded by his Son Robert	73
58	The Death Warrant read to Mary Queen of Scots	509
60	Death of Wat Tyler	220
62	Lord Sinclair advising King James to revenge the Murder of Mary Queen of Scots	512
64	Becket assassinated	108
66	The Victory of Poictiers	209
68	Death of Cardinal Wolsey	372
70	Henry VII. crowned in Bosworth Field	318
72	Battle of Agincourt	266
74	Heads of William I. William II. Henry I. and Stephen	66
76	Eleanor doing Penance for Witchcraft	112
78	The Prince of Wales brought before Edward after the Battle of Tewkesbury	306
80	The Humanity of General Amherst		379
82	Departure of the Pretender from Scotland		356
84	The Burning of Archbishop Cranmer	444
86	Cardinal Wolsey receiving a Letter sent by Henry VIII.	372
88	The resigning of the Duke of York	312
90	Magna Charta presented to King John	136
92	Heads of Henry II. Richard I. and John	99
94	Death of Henry V.	270
96	Queen Elizabeth in the Camp at Tilbury	515
98	Duke of Gloucester accusing Jane Shore of Witchcraft	313
100	Mary Queen of Scots arrested	475
102	Attempt to assassinate Prince Edward in Palestine	159
104	Dreadful Fire of London in 1666		225
106	Buckingham assassinated by Felton		78
108	Vortigern and Rowena	17
110	Death of Henry IV.	262
112	Caractacus before Claudius	9
114	Heads of Henry IV. Henry V. Henry VI. and Edward IV.	257
116	Alfred in the Danish Camp	39
118	The Siege of Calais	206
120	Lady Gray's Interview with Edward IV.	300
122	Heads of Edward I. Edward II. Edward III. and Richard II.	161
124	Interview between Edward III. and the Prince of Wales after the Battle of Crecy.	204
126	The Act of Union read before Queen Anne.		306
128	The Magnanimity of William Despreaux	124
130	Death of Sir Philip Sidney	501
132	Heads of Elizabeth, Mary, Henry VII. Henry VIII. and Edward VI.	326
134	Lord Russel's last Interview with his Family		258
136	Heads of Queen Anne, George I. and George II.		298
138	Destruction of the French Fleet by Admiral Martin in the Bay of Rosas		604
140	Death of Lord Nelson		574
142	Heads of James I. Charles I. Charles II. James II. and William and Mary		3
146	Heads of George III. and Queen Charlotte		381
150	Death of Sir Ralph Abercrombie		497

The INDEXES at the End of each Volume.

Stratford, Printer,
Crown Court, Temple-Bar.

DA
30
C325

Camden, Theophilus
The imperial history of England

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE
CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY